Special feature - Survivors’ Poetry videos, featured on Vimeo

Sean Burn launches his new pamphlet ‘People are their own dreams’

Feature article ‘Past-present-future tense’ by Philip Ruthen Broadsheet, Review and more ...

promoting poetry, prose, plays, art and music by survivors of mental distress
New publications available from Survivors’ Press

Trevor Innes was born in Lowestoft in 1946 and remains proud of his fishing and working-class roots. He studied English at Oxford, did research at Sheffield and had a career as head of faculty and English teacher in Sixth Form Colleges and F.E. Colleges. Mental health breakdown forced early retirement and many spells in hospital - he hears voices, as many thousands do! As the poems show, he believes a new world order may be coming with changed attitudes to religion and the world economy and saving the planet - will a movement for change enlivened by values ever happen? After some wilderness years travelling the country he now lives in Ludlow with his beloved second wife Pat and a problem dog; they are kept busy by art and arts and humanism and Labour Party politics and talking and friends and children and grandchildren.

Venetia Tompkins was born in 1949, in Hadleigh, Suffolk. She grew up in the country, near Baylham, with her mother, father, brother, three sisters, and a herd of goats. She was very shy, hated school, found making friends difficult outside the family. From an early age she painted, and later began writing poetry. She acquired an unwanted companion, The Watcher, an entity whose existence, if not its exact form, will be familiar to many Schizophrenics. She also began to self-harm. At age sixteen she was herself diagnosed with Schizophrenia, and was treated with ECT and drug therapy. She survived, became a student, learned how to make friends, went on Kibbutz, fell in love, fell ill, was given more ECT in Israel (without anaesthetic) was rescued and flown home. Then came marriage, motherhood, Open University, work as a Montessori lecturer, the breakup of her marriage, more time in hospital, the arrival of a grandchild, caring for herself, her mother, and The Watcher; all coupled with the realization of her need to keep writing, which she has done. In her own words “I used, and still use, my poetry as a refuge and solace.” Venetia Tompkins is extremely gifted and extremely courageous. It has been a pleasure and a privilege to work with her.

Available at our online bookshop or send a check payable to Survivors’ Poetry

Trevor Innes - Finding Your Selves
ISBN: 978-1-874595-36-6

Venetia Tompkins - Dark Time Begins to Crack

Sean Burn - People are their own dreams

Sean Burn has an international reputation as writer, performer and outsider artist. He's active nationally in disability arts. Currently artist in residence for Celf o Gwympas and Oriel Beaumont, he was shortlisted for a DadaFest Disability Arts Award 2009 and Outside IN’s artist in residence to The New Art Gallery - Wedal - in association with DASH (Disability Arts Shropshire), ‘reclaiming the languages of lunacy’. This was the first of three residencies mainstreaming disability arts. His plays have been performed by Breaking Binary, CTC, First Draft, Free-thinking Festival (Radio Three), Gobscure, Half Moon, Maverick, Pegasus, Paines Plough, Queens Hall Arts, Under Construction, Weaver-Hughes Ensemble and Zeitgeist. His thirty poetry films receive many screenings worldwide, at Tate Modern and National Film Theatre Studios, London. Exhibitions / Installations/ Performances toured with Arcades Cesta, Czech Republic, DADA-South, Dash, The Door (Birmingham Rep), Fotofeis and Grampian Hospital Arts’ Trust, Fold and Fred, Gulbenkian - Canterbury, Lit Up, Humber Mouth Festival, Interarte, Germany, Lancaster University and Lancaster LitFest. New Word Order, Odin’s Glow, Ovada, Platform 00000008, Shout festival, Stanley Picker Gallery, the Live Art Development Agency. His most recent of three CDs is Speaksong (with Gareth Mitchell). Skrev Press published a third full-length collection of his writing – Wings are GivengOut – in 2009.
Survivors’ Poetry (SP) is a unique national charity which promotes the writing of survivors of mental distress. Please visit: www.survivorspoetry.org for more information or please write to us. A Survivor may be a person with a current or past experience of psychiatric hospitals, ECT, tranquillisers or other medication, a user of counselling services, a survivor of sexual abuse, child abuse and any other person who has empathy with the experiences of survivors. Poetry Express reflects the expression of interests, as well as, poetry and prose, of the survivor community. SP features a mix of contributions.

Featured articles, art and poetry © of contributors. Printed with kind permission.

Editor: Dave Russell
Art Editor, Coordinator and Typesetting by: Blanche Donnery Editorial Team: Blanche Donnery, Roy Birch & Simon Jenner Cover Image: ©Dave St. Clair

Poetry Express (PE) is only published in PDF format. Contact us to join our mailing list. We welcome Submissions: Poetry, articles, news items, and other matter which may be of interest to our readers. We cannot guarantee publication and reserve the right to edit contributions. The views expressed in this publication are those of the individual authors, and do not necessarily represent the views of Survivors’ Poetry. All Poems/Artwork printed herein are the copyright of the authors credited.

Survivors’ Poetry
Studio 11, Bickerton House 25-27 Bickerton Road London N19 5JT
Tel 020 7281 4654
info@survivorspoetry.org.uk www.survivorspoetry.org

Patrons:
Mario Petrucci, Debjani Chatterjee MBE

Trustees: Marius Jankowski, Philip Ruthen (Chair), Celia Potterton, Judith Graham.

Staff:
Simon Jenner (Director), Roy Birch (National Outreach Coordinator and Mentoring Scheme Coordinator), Blanche Donnery (Administration, Marketing and Design).

Freelance Staff/Contractors:
Dark Systems Ltd (IT), Hugh Ellacott (Videos), Luminal Ltd (Website Developer).

Volunteers:
Dave Russell (Reviews & Events), Xochitl Tuck & Razz (Poetry Cafe Events’ Coordinators).
Another successful evening at September’s Poetry Café, with special guests poet Jessica Lawrence and singer-songwriter Kath Tait.

Jessica described some of her pieces as stories, as they were based on actual events:

“Refugee Trees: basically drawing on the ‘blunt stubs of the trees’ as war imagery, as images of butchery, when violence is perpetrated upon living things for sheer gratification and profiteering. Carlotta: a rhyming fast paced poem about a woman being robbed in Petticoat Lane market—of £500 in cash she had worked for, minimum wage to buy her Mum a present and pay the rent. “Carlotta, I bet he forgot her, the rotter who robbed her in Petticoat Lane/£500 quid he stole from her person/if I met him I’d kick him and punch him and curse him! . . . can’t remember the rest as don’t have it with me!! OK also: Xenon Enhanced CT Scan: about being given this hallucinating gas when having a brain CT done,(inducing a ‘tarantella jitter’ with cosmic, astral dimensions): Hedgehog . . . finding a rather large squashed hedgehog in the road (the painful occurrence witnessed by a child) . . . Eternal Moment: a contemplative moment spent with my geriatric cat ‘bird watching’ in the garden, knowing this was a mere snapshot in the annals of time, to be soon swept up like a grain of sand into an oceanic cauldron of such benign yet poignant events. Swimming Pool: a very rhythmic jazzy sort of poem based on a year of swimming at Vale Pool Swimming pool Wembley.” Jessica’s environmental awareness was proclaimed in her reflection on the Parnassian Golden Frog, a threatened species discovered by David Attenborough, “the frog who talked in semaphore”, and also in her condemnation of the ruthlessness of tree surgeons (‘refugee trees’).

Razz made his customary, catalytic contribution, including his searing indictment of a ‘gunning down’ by American helicopters. On behalf of all in Survivors, I wish to express the greatest condolences for his terrible accident, and wish him a speedy recovery.

A welcome contribution from Natacha Bryan, new mentee. Anita is finding her feet with the blues. Her Walking to See the Devil shows that she has done her Robert Johnson homework. A bit of Drama from Eve, with her interesting gloss on the theme of ‘Away in a Manger’. Some interesting poems and songs from Brian, including Eulogy for a Friend, showing the influence of Stephen Stills and Neil Young. Nice Spot from Masque (who did a full set earlier this year); tasteful guitar, and melodic flute. The Spanish-style Veinte Anos was especially moving. Helen McCookerybook is indeed a thought-provoking performer, uttering phrases like ‘fame is just a passing through’. Some rhythmic robustness from Mark Knight. Stuart Black continues to gain polish and confidence, as well as developing his vocal delivery. The evening concluded with a predictably angular spot from Celia Potterton.

In the publication area, one major breakthrough is the release of Venetia Tomkins’ Collection, Dark Time Begins to Crack, and two more mentoring scheme pamphlets, People are their own dreams by Sean Burn, and Finding Your Selves by Trevor Innes.

Roy Birch is taking a Sabbatical in September, therefore there will be no Outreach report in this issue.

Kath has long been a mainstay of Survivors events. She made some of her typical laconic observations – this time on freedom from stereotypes in Highgate Ladies’ Pond. Some of her perennial evergreen favourites, such as The Friendly Song, the lament of the harassed householder, The Fading Rose, her indictment of the shallowness of the beauty industry, and in Lentils some nostalgia for the days of hippiedom, when ‘our wisdom flourished, our wealth did not’. There was the happily ebullient River of Life, celebration of an independent free spirit, followed by a statement of vulnerability in The Moon, the Darkness and You. Finally the employee’s grievance Don’t Rush Me. Her albums are at present sold out, though she is planning a repressing of Bastards.
Good autumn, and welcome to the days of Desperate rather than Autumn statements. As I write National Poetry Day looms, and various gambits of how we should celebrate are solidifying with horrible pressure in my head. It's curious that the most evidential activity of such things is visual – on websites like the recently embattled Poetry Society's for instance, or indeed ours.

At a time when many poetry organisations and indeed presses have had their funding removed, it's even more curious to be writing with a sense of having come through much and facing the genuine reduction levels that a tail-off of the Arts Council's generous Sustain Funding entails. Consultants, part of the Agreement, are poised, and a lot of talking has pushed back the funding bids I'm making. I hope I have a staff to make them for. Survivor guilt.

Not that they'd thank me for talking about this. More important is what's happening not only to poetry presses and organisations but what's been pushed back as a hot agenda from last May – the NHS Reforms. We've seen what these have entailed for over a year, for survivors and people with mental health provision or a lack of it, since at least June 2010 - almost 16 months ago.

I'll soon be able to be more specific. But alarming stories have reached us that several mental health organisations have had to merge with organisations that – to be blunt – don't share their values (as the Waitrose strapline has it about their farmers) as a kind of given. Beyond that, several are allegedly hostile to survivors, and tell them they're not welcome if they can't be more positive and stop moping. Should this prove accurate – and such reports come from diverse and reputable sources - I'll name names when I've got permission from them. Some answers from certain providers would be welcome then.

I'd be happy – hardly the word – at this point, to receive your own experiences of the mental health provision you've been offered, how it has either commenced, continued, discontinued, or tailed off. Naturally things can only get worse, with the ideological disdain bordering on seeming hatred in some instances, that the present regime visits upon us all. But beyond that, we need to uncover specific and systemic examples, something that might give us a sense of a deeper pattern or undeclared policy (such as the emails sent privately by MPs, that are now coming under scrutiny). We can at least bear witness to evil times, as Milton said.

But to return to National Poetry Day, we've at least got something to celebrate. Three new titles, by three extraordinary poets - and all more than worthy of a PBS nomination. One was a pamphlet too long for their criteria. We knew, and in another instance, the author decided not to delay publication (being book-length, where you have to submit a typescript 5 months ahead, but not with pamphlets).

I had the honour to edit Sean Burn – my introduction to his work, a fuller treatment of the preface in the volume (People are their own dreams), see page 30 – and since we began his career has blossomed. He's had another book nominated for at least one national poetry prize, and plays commencing a second run. He opines that this had at least something to do with our encouragement, though to me Sean is a finished (achieved, not assassinated!) poet.

Venetia Tompkins’ remarkable full-length debut is the culmination of many years association with Survivors’ Poetry [SP], starting with the championing of James Ferguson, sometime Editor of Poetry Express from 2002-05. Dark Time Begins to Crack. It’s an immensely powerful and sophisticated personal odyssey.

Amongst her sophistications and agonies, Tompkins draws upon a central inspiration, that at first comes unexpectedly: Dorothy Richardson (1884-1957) and her 13 volume Pilgrimage, a stream of consciousness work that for many feminists counterpointed the more celebrated work of Virginia Woolf or even Katherine Mansfield. Reading Tompkins one can see that she’s received, infused, and (for her more compact and poetic purposes) transcended her model.

Trevor Innes’ Finding Your Selves is big enough in both ambition and scope as well as pagination, to make a pamphlet format seem frankly inadequate. It was partly due to his own modesty, but his scale of articulation and political commentary belies this, and the work duly bursts out of its seams. It’s an enormously erudite and politically engaged poet who also addresses elegiac loss, the interleaving of poetry with the raw permission of relationships; and a richer diversity of human scale than you normally encounter alongside a blistering of political witness.

After Oxford, Innes taught and became a highly respected Head Teacher, before illness intervened. Survivors, he reminds us by quiet example, come from every walk and indeed time of life. Like European and South American poets, and unlike many British ones, Innes addresses a continuum of the human economy as it were, and doesn’t break it up into job lots of concern, special interest, and specialisms in the poetry workshop menu tool bar.

Nor should we. So I won’t end on agit-prop, tempting in this climate as that is. The final poem of the alert and political Trevor Innes’ collection, is a sonnet: ‘The Wider Ripples of Love’. It concludes typical themes: a near-affirmation in its sestet where tenebrous joy trembles against something darker, wrenched back into purpose, planning and an escape route from imposed chaos, to a greater control over our own lives:

Still I try to be my doubting hero. You burn your selves, at the centre and more than a queen. I dream that white lights will join with new age spirits, reasons, knowledge, forms. We talk over news, plan larger projects. Relax. Enjoy. The quests are nearly home.
a) Resisting fiction

Today as I write—’is it late, or early?—the streets quiet now, the bulbs bright in this flat, I prepare to send to an on-line magazine three pieces of writing that I view as extensions of the truths and fictions of who I am, who we are as a society, how we remember and forget, how we hope and build our hopes solidly and further from the precipices.

‘Memorial’, first published a decade-and-a-half ago, re-printed several times more at strangely, worryingly apposite times, offered then and now as a memorial, is also again a too-contemporary narrative. Will there soon come a time when the systematic ‘shutting away’ of countless thousands of people will become forgotten, a myth, denied? Or is there coming a time when such a system will again become an easy option for government and wider society to remove people who, for whatever ‘reason’, don’t quite ‘fit in’? Are there good aspects in the ideas of sanctuary to be held on to, are there positive experiences and the narratives of people to be listened to and contemplated—not just ‘productive formal policies’ to be constructed from the rubble of lives and buildings?

In a connected theme, the poem ‘Melleril’ came from similar origins, also the disarray of a life; but shows, I hope, that in those, and these times, a poetry of resistance denies the imposition of other people’s or a systematic fiction about ourselves going forward in the shared circumstance.

b) Memorial

“Born free: free as the wind blows...”

The steel band in the fair-sized yellow and white striped marquee was raucous. The bar at the far end, selling mainly ‘shorts’ (they were indeed short) had now been open several hours, and the band had taken full advantage. Willa Davies sighed; a single tear ran down her creased, old face. I grasped her hand and she looked at me as if she was remembering every minute detail of her ninety-one years. But I knew she couldn’t. She looked across the table with its mauve paper cloth, and smiled. Smiled at Emile. For three years, she hadn’t set eyes on him, or heard from him, not knowing if he were alive or dead—out in the ‘community’. Willa knew that before long the nursing home staff would whisk them away after the speeches in their respective ambulances. Would she ever see Emile again? She had loved him; he was the only man she had loved or been close to, but events had separated them at the times when they had needed each other most.

Sixty years has passed since their first meeting, here at Westborn psychiatric asylum. Now it was closing, the party a final farewell to the staff, ‘ex-patients’, hangers-on, ex-chief executives. Over five hundred people mingling about the only open section of the once thriving sanctuary, now mostly boarded and silent. The Great Hall closed and derelict for twenty, thirty years, was now throbbing to the sound system of the local radio station. Teenagers and younger children (who I hoped would never again see inside such an institution) were dancing vigorously to the latest ‘Prodigy’ anthem. Where was, I thought, the progeny of the inmates, the families, the friends? Of the numerous guests, only a handful of the resettled ‘ex-patients’ were present, conspicuous by their jagged movements, their ill-fitting and dowdy party clothes, the missing teeth, the jerking legs. A celebration for selling the land at a discount to developers, whilst three score patients died during or soon after being forced to move out of their ‘home’.

And where was this promised ‘community’ they were moving to? Willa and Emile didn’t know. It had been sold to them as a concept, something they couldn’t really touch or understand. Never more true than sitting huddled in an upright chair, a table wedging her in so Willa could not rise, listening to the splutters and whines around her in a shabby nursing home. What was the community for her if she saw the same faces day after day, unspeaking faces, tied up in their own pain, their own miseries, their own loneliness? No visitors, the occasional postcard from a niece who wasn’t really related, and who had left Wales to live abroad in Saudi with her engineer husband. Only the vision of Emile, Emile as a young man, when he fought to escape the locked ward. A handsome, solid man in 1933. Willa smiled again. She knew Emile would be thinking ‘this is not the way it should be, to celebrate suffering, to end the hope’. Topped off with a glossy pamphlet, full of typos, celebrating the successful resettlement teams, with a selective history of the 97 years of Westborn’s existence.

What did Emile think? No one could ever know his mind; it had been abused and disturbed by ECT, by sleep treatments. His birth, his origins, had been shrouded in mystery even when he had entered the asylum those decades before, found wandering the valley, picked up, and deposited by a local farmer. He would not speak, having simply an incredible urge for freedom. It took four warders to pin him down, preventing his escape. Willa was not the only woman Emile had been close to over the ensuing years, but he had always been discreet in his own way, not wanting to let her down. There had been a bond between them that went further than the camaraderie of the wards, but now, Emile was tired. How he, how both of them, had survived the regime of inhuman treatments, of experimental drugs, is anyone’s guess. I look around me, and see those twisted forms and wonder at human resilience. I also wonder at what we call civilisation, what harm we do in the name of supposedly protecting the majority. Whether Willa ever contemplated this herself, I do not know. Alone in her ‘cell’ at the nursing home, staffed by a bank team of nurses brought from overseas, she could not make the simplest request in her small high voice understood. But I knew she was tough.

There must have been over an hundred people in the queue for the buffet. John, an old acquaintance of Willa’s, came over and greeted her. She suffered his enthusiastic words in near silence. ‘I hate him’, she said to me. There were few men Willa had any time for, except perhaps the gentler, younger men who sometimes appeared professionally in her life. However, these she had not had to live with for decades in close quarters, being taunted and ridiculed for her virginity, and for her love of the rogue Emile. Somebody way back, I knew, must have taken advantage of her naivety—she would try to pay me for the smallest thing. She would reach into her cloth handbag for a large child’s purse, fingering the small change, not knowing what to do with the notes. I repeatedly tell her that I did not require payment, for instance, for taking her for a walk around the hospital grounds. In her soft, Welsh accent, she would thank me, and return the purse to the depths of that worn cloth bag that held much of her life.

It was a chill evening for July; the rain, forecasted, held off, at least until after the speeches. The Chief Executive, fighting to be heard over the throng in front of the marquee, gave a short talk on the merits of care in the community, and how so many different purchasers, partners and stakeholders had been co-ordinated in the resettlement process. What did this mean to Emile and Willa? I wondered if it really meant the restriction of freedom of movement. The operational manager, giving much praise to the nursing staff and caterers, again had few words to spare for the loyal ex-patients gathered on the pitted lawn. This day should have been for them. Instead, it was a jamboree, and a free one at that, the staff and families able to sigh with relief over the closing of a chapter in their lives. Now they could, some of them, move to better things, with a redundancy cheque behind them.

Willa was again tearful. I had only managed to retrieve a couple of sausage rolls for her from what was left of the buffet—I was afraid of the dressing-down I would get from the nursing home if Willa went home hungry. Emile’s ambulance had arrived to transport him and nine of his companions to their resting place. With a weary grasp of Willa’s hand, a look into her eyes, Emile was shuffled out of the asylum for the last time. Looking back at the redbrick edifice windows broken, grounds overgrown, he could not help feeling a choking in his throat, a tightening of his chest. He was carried away with the other nodding figures, the way he had arrived—with a future denied him.

The steel band began again, people were dancing, drinking, laughing. Willa was tired, and wanted a milky drink and bed. I too had had enough:

“Fly me to the moon... in other words, I love you.”

c) Melleril

Today it’s as if God had died; shall I ask if this is why she’s sad and bored with only our cat for company as I lie in blankness, just as I keep vigil through the night then sleep badly in a broken body through the day. It would piss off a saint when pain means you have to choose carefully everything and everyone - but we hope, we hope, and the darkness may reluctantly retreat from the blaze of the risen sun.

Philip Ruthen. Thanks to Cambrensis – Short Story Wales, Poets’ Letter, Happy in Hospital national poetry competition anthology, for previous publication and support.
In it but not of it

He was standing on the corner Smoking a Park Drive
A bottle in his pocket
And bygone on his mind
Did it ever really happen?
Did he kiss her on the bridge?
Does she know how much he’s missed her?
Done a lifetime stretch
Now it’s pills and potions Booze and cigarettes
An armchair at the bookies
And who cares what comes next

Reprobates and misfits He’s joined and got the badge Jeff Beck on the player
And the brethren on the cadge
He can still twang a solo
And play a sneaky chord
But those and creative powers Bring not peace but a sword
The poets and the muses Find it hard to stay in time Look, he’s on the corner Beneath a big full moon
He lights up a Parkie
And checks his empty wallet
The fate of the dreamer
In it but not of it

Patrick D. Fitzhenry

Conches

A big new Star in the night sky the one we gaze at, all together smoking!
I wish this spring would bring the warmest summer,
I wish we walked by the coast,
the sunbeams sunk in the waves.
We would get lost in the Conches like then, when we were children how much vigour in our souls when they trembled towards the Unknown, towards the Beautiful We got puzzled by beauty.
You stared with awe at the big new Star in the night sky!

Yannis Anastasopoulos

The Frozen Time

I want to tell you a story about a girl of twenty two with two suitcases got on a bus to London After wiping herself off the streets Picking up her pride Putting herself back together And tried to make a new start Her heart had been smashed Beyond repair
Through many injustices She didn’t know then That half a life later
She would still be fighting To lose the baggage
That had weighed her down
Two cases, like a dying salesman, carrying her dreams, her hopes Because no matter How she tried Life was mean
And brought her back To the frozen time From 7 to 22
Betrayed by her father Betrayed by her brothers Sins of their father paid to her Betrayed by her sisters
They didn’t want to know
She had no mind of her own Betrayed by boys Beaten and kicked Betrayed by girls Violation was their feminism Humour got her through And music fed her soul And many times she Woke in her darkened world Even took some tablets Wishing O wishing
That she was alive
But at the same time, wanting to die
But like the other walking dead She somehow carries on And vile memories haunt her And she hates the sun
But you wouldn’t know it Because like her mother
She can make you laugh
But she feels punished With this carrying on This girl tries to walk In newly heeled and polished boots And ends up walking Through a muddy field She’s been lost most of her life She’s chased her tail
And tried the help Of academic know alls
Who say ‘forget the past’
But they know not what it is To travel in an empty space And try to find your place in the universe
Your life was taken from you Your choices and your mind
You were stripped bare of your dignity And heart hoisted high Like Jesus on the Cross
You don’t belong
You don’t succeed
No matter how you try
You are a dirty little girl
With a warped demented mind - Not of others – of you You trip yourself up like a junkie without a needle
You spill your wrath like lava from a beetle Your overheated emotions Come out of the volcano
That boiled you up spat you out and laid you on the table
For all to take a piece of like birthday cake iced detail Take a bit of her, chew a bit of her, swallow a bit of her But don’t keep her, don’t nurture her, don’t digest her Just use her and spit her out – you don’t need her She’s an accessory
Alright to hang on my arm Alright to smile and give charm Alright to use when your horny Don’t worry she won’t say owt You’re protected, can carry on as normal Protest at the jibe of incestuous lies After all, who’d believe her She’s not normal, she’s weird, she’s from another world
She doesn’t fit into this community, this town, this mentality Close ranks!
Just kick her back to touch, it’s what she understands
She will be subservient and do your bidding Put her life on hold and send her to where they play the music she can dance to Freeze – get higher baby, and don’t ever come down!

Wendy Young

A ‘Bad’ Mother Grieves

I realise my only hope Is to find some kind of way to cope With the guilt that hounds me from within,
But I’m paralysed by a sense of sin.
When I was younger things were good,
I loved my children like I should,
I read them stories when they went to bed,
They loved me too (that’s what they said).
The years have passed and I’m getting old;
It’s funny how your heart grows cold ‘Cos now I don’t care one little bit About the family and that shit
Who married me and destroyed my life
By persuading me to be his wife.
He made me feel like I didn’t exist
Although he squeezed me when we kissed,
He shattered every innocent dream
And when I wake at night I scream.
There’s no-one now who can explain Why the nightmares come again and again, They’ll never understand my pain
And my awful fear of going insane.

John Thorkild Ellison

White Pigeon

All the washed up stigma that clings to wings of vermin echoes through your name.

Among your winged counterparts, you flourish in their shadows, a lonesome wave of small footsteps.

You are the black sheep in white, not in flight but in grace, walking like a lost halo in sunlight.

Greg Williams

The Cross

The people carrying the Cross kept walking and I was passing through them like a ghost!
And the gaze, the touch, the words of the Friend balsam!
White candles in the night a wave of fires!
I was looking at the Cross patiently.
The neighbourhood in the streets, each one with his burden!
“Christ is risen!”

Yannis Anastasopoulos
Tomato Art

My eldest brother Lives in Sheffield
I don't know where
But I know why
He reacted to the constant taunts Of kids and his frozen mind prompted him to do what his father did and he hit a kid and he had to leave his home town.
Now he won't answer the door
In case the police are there – he's in his 60s.
I know he pulled out his eyelashes I know he shat in the fire grate
I know he painted yachts in oils in prison
I know that one sat on Grandma's shelf
I know that he was cured of his 10 year old toothache
I know that father punched it out
I know that he fell off his bike and banged his head
I know that he was never the same again, mother said I know I remember the tales he told
I know that the memory of fear he had was almost a grin like a chimp doing tricks
I know he saw father's fist punch through mother's mouth
I know he heard my mother's screams of no Jim no night after night after night
I know he saw him punch the rabbit's face
I know he held it up by its ears, every drunken night, every drunken night.
I know he drew battles of world war two on his bedroom wall
I know he didn't know where to draw the line with his little brothers and sisters

So I try to ignore the memory of fear I had when he was around The grown up fights he had with father I had to split up
The weight of him when I tried to pull him out of the chair Out of the way of father's roar.
His mantra 'someone's going to die tonight' behind his bedroom door To drunk father swearing his demise on the long walk up the stairs And my fingers in my ears
Every night, every night
The time when I was a kid in the toilet, Ian's grinning face and fat penis.

And as I bite into my tomato,
Looking over the Chilterns,
I think how Ian cut his into eight, Scattered salt over Took his knife and fork
And made a meal of it Being the artist he is.

Wendy Young

‘Tears’

They course down my face
A symbol of my inner pain
They are without acknowledgement Without grace Haphazard, running unchartered
They are despair
A symbol of yet more to come They fall unimpeded
They are the tears of my pain

Their fall is planned
They hit the ground Watering the blooms there Unchaste
Their cause is far away
They cleanse, heal Sweep clean, renew Helped by kind words
They are the tears of my hope

They well in my eyes
The knowledge filling my mind
Their source not unkind Though not able to fill the void
It is though Decreasing in size Filled with the once needed Though unheeded love
They are the tears of my soul

Samantha Long

Picadilly Busk

Upon the pavement kissed by Metro trams, Psyche's Kora suit duet's beats rhythmic drums, Where pluck's rich plectrum heat swung come to jams,
When wedded feet display pitch Bongo rums,
And in this Square's Metropolis busk dance,
A pulse of here's now hear a sound that calls, Upon mind's like to capture in entrance, Note's brilliant arpegg'ò tantric ralls.
Yet as the eyes in book page more concerts,
And vendors street for change as players rest,
So rounds applause begs ever more deserts,
As listeners late to day the evening's crest.
Thus Picadilly busk in light's aura, Zing's the fading sight cooled by the Bora.

Barry Bardshaigh
Nothing is lost
Nothing is lost when the sun goes down to light up distant lands.

Nothing is lost
when the wind eases and umbrellas stay in one piece.

Nothing is lost when we die and mingle with the soil.

Nothing is lost when we say goodbye and our memories last forever.

Mandy Ducksbury Windrush

A Tin For A Rainy Day

The tin in my hand used to contain old pennies
I don't know where it came from or who bought it.
The slit at the top was made with some sort of instrument.
Pennies I was told were saved for a rainy day.
I couldn't understand why for a rainy day and not a sunny day
Oh well perhaps one day when I've grown up I will understand.
The tin was empty, it must have been raining Silver and grey with red paint on the top it felt smooth to touch.
I like to feel the coldness of the metal against my warm skin.
The tin could tell many a story maybe one day I will understand.

Mandy Ducksbury Windrush

Et Philos

Between two heart beats moments butterfly, Emotions tingles breath awaits in grasp,
To zing desire in quivers thrilling hie,
And climax longs in kisses throbbing gasp.
Then shall the love we bear unite in wrest Of ruby lips in Cherie Mon de fare,
So succulent to sun so sweetest blest,
That ripe is joy and ecstasy its Fleur.
So in hearts kitchen heat of loves concord, I’s egg the beat that cakes in Leah’s hope,
And whip’s in sweeps cloth plays of nips discord,
As smiled cheese toasts so hot as lovers grope.
Then chilly be not hot but love a-more,
Or chilli be not heat but hearts a-dore!

Barry Bradshaigh

Absence Report

In seven years, seven long, torturous years,
my life a wreck, I've got nothing to show – a two year suspended bullying and harassment, Conduct Code, issue, after I'd said something insensitive and stupid to an ex-soldier, Bruce, teeth, faculties, all gone, whether he was 'shacked-up' with Sheila, recently emigrated from South Africa, a delicious German pretzel coated in mustard – what with his wife in hospital, unable to drive,
and Sheila with her spare room, now long term sick with acute arthritic fingers, painful, enflamed wrists.

I've managed to meet the required standard of attendance I've been mostly morose, hung-over, picking arguments and fights with all and sundry,
an arrogant Italian who challenged me as lazy, everyone steering clear of me, menopausal women on anti-depressants, blaming me,
one almost veering into the back of a lorry – my patronising manager calling me ‘amigo...’

Fizzing Alka-Seltzers for breakfast...

Coffee and cigarettes, self-inflicted injuries, owing money, no love too cracking my ribs, falling over on the ice and snow, stomach upsets from the Rushmoor Kebab in town, on Victoria Road, flu, diarrhoea official industrial action which I spent polishing the balls with Brasso in the snooker hall or in Ladbrokes
a sore, rasping throat, inhaling too much dust...

Bereavement, the death of my father, more industrial action and bruised ribs, an eye irritation, general nausea, my working environment...

In seven long years.

Simon Robson
I

I am never one thing I am myriad I am legion. I represent

Nothing more than my voices They take turns I am a kaleidoscope That reconfigures

I am your mental patient. You do Not expect my changes my Apparent new line — ask me to explain Why I said it. I am

Listening with many personalities
And one is active to sort

A thread of conversation into A whole where they belong

In the personality the dropped stitches Are trying to re-knit

They are asking the unspoken question Answering the unspoken thought Of those who are with them

And it was endangering when it Slipped the stitch so they are annoyed

Unless they get the reasoning behind it
The person is trying to get back Into their company. The mad person Wants the force of their personality's

Views to be acknowledged again
The small tree is trying to view

The sky. The others have grown Not noticing.

Juliet Ruth Jones

Goddess

Why of course in dreams I catch nothing but common Language? My soul fixes and drives away Depths? I cancel the love I believe in?
Like Eve I trick myself, I ruin others?
I am callow like a myriad colour butterfly? But I eat and silently mystery unfold of child
I look at you and remind you, you think these things That Nature fashions the unknown in me

17 Pillars are raised to meet the heavens
They are mankind struggling with stone No food to eat. They have a magic touch That aligns each and every pillar with the Sun I am an acolyte who learns in a figurative

Speech. I damn the fortunes of sailors And men pray to me. I am able to say Anything I like. I am wise in everything I say. My gold is tressed around my shoulders And hair. I have a fixed stare that Reflects on every and each ideal in life, perfectly A man put me there. I was behind him Plucking corn, working with him.

My female Servant touches up a smile

As she holds his hand the chisel Held by both we rule together we contradict Jupiter with wisdom. We are Man and woman.

In your twilight years
You druids yawn and turn to welcome Christ It is a decision of the female. She Smiles a wisdom gone beyond your Friars I am the eternal — abnegation — that brings me alive.

Juliet Ruth Jones

Two Dads

Standing at a bus stop, this boy, and his girl, made me cry Tears so profuse, as if they’d fell from the sky Never seen them before, never will again, I suppose What got me, was the way he planted a kiss on her nose

She was only a toddler, lying asleep in her chair
When she stirred, he soothed her by stroking her hair I couldn’t help but say something; I just had to It was beautiful, given the chance; it’s what I’d do

I said ‘...that’s lovely, I haven’t seen mine for 3 years’
It was his reply that gave meaning to my tears ‘I only get her for 6 hours a week, it breaks my heart
She cries when I give her back, I cry when we’re apart’

He knelt down and gently rested his hand on her head In silence we bonded, without a word being said
We knew we weren’t alone ... for a little while, of sorts So often we were, with unhappy thoughts

Why don’t you see yours?’ he said
All thoughts and reasons went straight from my head
The simple truth was ... I didn't know I wanted to, I want to-.but I don’t know

So I told him what my wife told me...”She doesn’t want me’ ‘My wife said ... she doesn’t want me’ ‘My baby, my life...doesn’t want me’ ‘She ... doesn’t want me’
...And I died inside

Ian Malin
The Quest of Embellishment

In the wake of birth where spirit loses itself in the soiled Earth.
A quest begins without womb, without function, without past.

A shell of vain hope co-exists with mortality.
Beauty structures itself in the within universe that naked eye soon cocoons.

Childhood dances with a soaked up sponge, placing you at home where dictatorship starts in the unholy basement.
Teenage resistance to the transparent callings of solitude.
The expansion of soul that sets the illusions free.

Set in stone motions, cut loose from the paternal inverse politics.
Rebellion ties itself to layers of conformity.

The young adult flee’s from a warm, yet sordid past, to new open doors.
A fresh face moulds with smiles that pave your way to glory.

The material is your Jesus on the cross.
A heavenly realm of chasing non-existent rainbows in a dark sky.

A scream of time that’s past the whisper stage, follows your dreaming body to the edge of the ocean’s depth, amongst agnostics drowning.

In your swallowed old age where illness glances to and fro and shelters the past, allowing you freedom to roam within the bittersweet.

And so sweet is the light that returns to you the true self that was never absent.

Jo Silver

Enid’s Passion

I have hopes for tomorrow, tomorrow I see my shrink.
Too many years have passed with a dim light on I need wit and laughter to return to my life Once this boarding school lass had passion Midnight feasts amongst the cows of Battle Abbey Lemonade furtively smuggled in by the kitchen staff Condensed milk in a tube, cold baked beans Oh what delights for me and my chums, straight out of Enid Blyton!

My daughter had a ‘go’ at Enid, then turned to Jacqueline Wilson A way of reflecting on her own issues possibly and Giving her a feeling of not being the only one.
Daughter did not go the boarding school way
She was encouraged to make choices Has an air of independence now as a result
And a devoted suitor. He buys her flowers and ‘adorable,’ fashion garments Grandma hears wedding bells and refers to boyfriend’s parents as inlaws G’ daughter sniffs this off, she wants to spend times with her mates Calls them babe and uses words like ‘cool’ Fashion Queen. The world waits for you.

Jo Silver

Fly her to the Sunshine

The bearded shrink has got “No Entry” on his door.
He’s lying naked with a patient on the floor
He massages her temples, she’s waiting for shock
But it’s all done by stealth in the E.C.Torture block She’s tired, she’s mixed up, she’s afraid
She can see the closing door
Fly her to the sunshine, it’s warm, it’s home
The cold white night has chilled her to the bone.

Classify, identify, dissect and diagnose Hearts of stone and ice-capped souls
Fly her to the sunshine, it’s warm, it’s home
The cold white night has chilled her to the bone.

Some half-cooked nurse says she ought to learn to laugh
It’s a wonderful life this – he’s got James Stewart’s autograph
But her body is shaking and her vision is blurred
And it’s been so long since that cheerful little girl
She’s tired, she’s mixed up, she’s afraid
She just can’t take no more
Fly her to the sunshine, it’s warm, it’s home
The cold white night has chilled her to the bone
The cold white night has chilled her right to the bone.

Patrick D. Fitzhenry
Half Moon

I imagine myself pinned to the stratosphere, where only you and I converse with the evening light.

In your pale emotionless past I see your fortress light the clouds with a sharp indigo mirage.

With an imagined Beethoven sonata and my own crisp silence, you grasp a second of enlightenment.

Greg Williams

Deny this and Deny that

Heavenly, how’s your fathers hotchpotch stinging in the sand Hopefuls’, head full, free of petrol sitting so hand Religious fervour strikes the hopeless dredging on the land Gloating gospel prima donnas fill in where it all began Licensed mouthful floods the sadness Amsterdam fellowship the need for reason, disjoining Disjointed in every way leave out the slack-fever to live another day
The meat of the moment sidesteps the tasselled banana skin Trying to suppress the sin that lurks within Flint and sculpture canned at birth what is all the landscape worth Nervous chattering holds the brawn clutch at straws dreadful bargains drawn Cape horn lauded helpless lesser shown what will Horatio bring to throw Deny this and deny that, the piece of fluff that broke the camels back Send the showpiece, for a jaunt around the racetrack Bloodlust is busy body building an unhappy return to chambers Foot pedals flirt with flux and flotation Thatch brogans insult the naked midgets in cosmetic surgery Power drive puppets fiddle the books and the surly bonds of gravity
The eyes and teeth of the world go to seed under the umbrella Treading the line on grey slanting deluge Feeding the bridge beneath a five-star skyline Working out with the hollow horse, cutting corners by hand Clinging to a faint gesture another printing error in your lifespan Heavenly how’s your fathers hotchpotch bloodstains on your hand Hopefuls’ head full free of petrol sitting in the sand Deny this and deny that the piece of fluff that broke the camel’s back Send the jockey for a jaunt around the racetrack.

Jana’s Fragments

She drags her white skin and red hair through a bundle of cravings and pierced hearts.
Her lover vanishes suddenly into the dark night, taking with him her universal birthright.

Like a mourned widow, her ego shell tightens round her eastern European waist, bringing with it those mild fragments of death.

Jana, the child of an ongoing fantasy, wrapped around and tied together with the cartoon blessings.
Art and heart, inseparable entities becoming deities with every passing glimpse.

(Based on a painting by Jana Fak)

Greg Williams

Kids who Lose!

As a child there was screaming and shouting my mother and father were always balling Sometimes mum was there. Sometimes not too young to stop it yet never forgot.

We cowered in corners where they didn’t see made to watch was my brother and me in refuge went mum us kids left behind behind with a drunk who’s very unkind furniture gradually began to disappear sold to next man so dad could buy beer even down to the coats on our back at the age of ten I was used like a doll from the roof of the house swung to and fro a bottle smashed over dads head he’s only unconscious though he was dead tactics we did to stay out of the way he’s drunk at night unconscious by day problematic parents we cannot chose it’s not just the parents but the kids who lose!

Jacqueline Robinson
Exile on mill street

Sidestep the cohesive banana, skins the meat of the neck from humble oranges, value added Turks spill the beans doggerel jewellery inside a corona of leaves fusing cats whiskers to cathode rays bleeps hindered by an acute case of blanket athletics lip reading beyond further far flung malpractice Besotted with moonquake and the value of tears comatosed autocrat promising an algebraic career the cyst on the sixpence puts the beekeeper in jail wide awake, yet dead as a doornail stop dragging those knuckles and start crimping those lugs lightning strikes thrice, like a storm in a teacup Paint trim and assembly usher in a new day a brief respite from the horizontal rain will the bowling boots surprise the nimble Nile perch envoy relation polishes napoleon solos shirt escapology jockeys dingdong with a slide rule gofer Insecticide rations a partial eclipse, apple steals the thunder Like two fish embalmed in a frozen river. Feed the bridge with a cats lick and a promise Take the bullet by the horns and free your wish list buck the trend in one fowl swoop sachet the rabbit and rope the spoon

Anthony Moore

A New world

In the Canal near the old stairs I banished and cleared my old fears, I threw away my basket, I picked up a new aspect. I now had a new basket of flowers. Bluebell, roses, bright and lovely all the hours; I saw hidden in the long grass, A lovely autumn rose in a mass. I walked further in my pinafore, And saw a ready folklore. Dreamingly, in my eyes stretched this new world. Step by step as I walked, life began to unfold. I took then a new step, seeing like a child With new interests, taking nothing as mild; A new world, breathing on me to unfold.

Pamela Odunaiya

A Miles Davis Moment

30 Jan 11

A blues measure is but a measure of life Each bar of notes a stage in existence Build a rhythm, then do the melody and walk Kind of Blue with Cannonball & Trane on his side The sounds came, as we have been taught, as in a single trumpet blast

All that follows is ordained For bop to take us into an Aranjuez dreamscape of Moorish melody parranda through an ancient street destined to be heard on concrete. The trumpet is muted & his spirit is vivid.

Ángel L. Martínez

Seeking refuge

When the wind blows hailstones in my face And I seek refuge from life disasters My dead father comes alive in uniform He commands me with a horse whip in his hand My radio body sometimes pleads with him I am like a frightened hamster denied food So I lay still waiting for my dead father To remain dead again like an Egyptian mummy

When the wind blows hailstones in my face And I find that words liquefy into the atmosphere I solidify my actions by painting with trembling hands My spirited being captured into a tribal dance of flowers My self confidence doubles and I think I am a legend artist I imagine I am rich the chosen few intelligent and famous But then people tell me to reactivate myself to readjust myself

When the wind blows hailstones in my face And the world seems a whirlwind cracker Circling hurricanes riding on my space my grace I hurl up like a drenched kitten in a corner Like the world's hose has been unleashed on me And my head speeds up like a ceiling fan in motion Whilst I cry and bleed from the heart from fear Still I live and so there is hope for better

Pamela Odunaiya
Dearest friend Viola

I must remind you of the mindless things we did to make us feel better
Do you remember the garden with the welcoming halo breathing on us
It shone on us like a dungeon lit with kerosene lamps
I remember when the hose washed my body in the hallway of the garden
I remember when laughter bubbled and swelled fuelled with endless secrets
I remember pretending I was an adult playing peek a boo with my doll

Do you remember growing up we pretended to be in Europe where wealth was abundant
They tell me of their stories No one sat at the fire at night to tell us those stories to make rain come
They didn't eat pink juicy African apples or charcoal grilled plantain yes or even guava
Do you remember walking for miles to school with a chair on your head barefooted
Do you remember the talking drums dancing during the masquerade festival Do you remember the feverish nights when we won the football world cup

Do you remember winning the beauty contest in secondary school
Do you remember your school mother she drew nature and told of tomorrow
Do you remember the several tricks we played in school the tribal weighty songs we sang
Do you remember leaving school and looking forward to a greener future
Now we are grown up and the wheel of opportunity and fortune have changed
I dream when I can of yesterday with my pinhole camera to capture the halo in it

Pamela Odunaiya

Father’s Song

It was a song of passing time, time never to be recaptured.
And when he sadly sang this song, it made him weep.
He cried quietly for life that was lost, and down his fragile, ageing skin the tears would fall onto my hand as I held his so closely and put it to my cheek.

I would wish to heal his hurting and would whisper, ‘do not cry’, but my brother, who understood more,
said quietly, ‘let him cry, it is better’, and, understanding, I would pause.

How often had my father and I exchanged the query, ‘why does intense beauty bring melancholy, why do we cry?’ For him it was the imperfections in each of us, it was the loss of lives in warfare, the calamity of discord, the realization of being no longer loved by one who had been the pivot of his being.
And after all the years of acceptance, of compromise, of coalition, love was still his true belief.

Venetia Tompkins
Performed by Simon Jenner - Director of Survivors’ Poetry, for National Poetry Day 2011 http://vimeo.com/29793624
Dear God,

Do you look like Charlton Heston in those epics on the telly?
Or are you like those statues of the Buddha with the belly?
Did you really make the stars? Have you got a face at all?
Is planet earth your masterpiece? Do you hear us when we call?
HELP!

Is there hell & is there heaven, or is that all just in our minds?
Do we live a thousand lifetimes, or is this the only time we get to tread a planet; get to touch & think & feel?
Then are we gone forever? Or do we get a better deal?

And have you got a sense of humour when we do the things we do?
Do you laugh at all our efforts to make some sense of you?
Are you a beacon of compassion, or are you made of sterner stuff?
Do you like it when some mortal attempts to call your bluff?

And could you do without the disciples when they come on so fanatical?
Have you left it up to us now and gone on a sabbatical?
Are you really just an absence we project on all the time?
Or are you a reality that goes way beyond the mind?

And all those politicians, they must really piss you off!
Sundays in the chapel, Mondays, noses in the trough!
And all those popes & ayatollahs, are they just signs of our soul disease?
And are you really only happy when we’re down upon our knees?

And who is it I’m talking to? At whom do I raise my fist?
I’m sure you’re more like energy, than an evangelist!
And if this is your masterpiece & if this is your turf
Then don’t you get frustrated that we don’t Know what its worth?

And if this is your masterpiece & if this is your turf
Are you sharpening up the lightning bolts before we make it worse?
Famine, flood & Geri Halliwell! Are they precursors of our curse?
Razz

Razz

is a poet performer, performance tutor and acts as our compare at Survivors’ Poetry open mic nights at the poetry cafe. He also compares at the Tottenham Chances open-mic night the fourth Thursday of each month.
Who will accompany me?

Who will accompany me on this journey to the underworld?

Who will put on a cloak of shadows?

Who will consent to leave the light, and enter willingly into the dead of night?

Who will accompany me?

And who will abandon safety, comfort, and the known, and turn away from the sweet lights of home.

Who will accompany me?

'Not any of those who have not felt their own woundedness, and your journey is your own.'

So who will unravel the tangled thread of the years and loosen the knots and be there when the pain sears?

Who will accompany me when I am mystified, when I no longer know, what makes my heart beat or my heart flow?

Who will accompany me? Who will make sure that I don't lose the spool of my life thus far, that I don't fall into the chasm of night, moonless, with no star light?

Hush, child; I shall accompany you, I shall be there with you, even when you are most unaware.

On this strange journey you will not be alone, take courage, take heart, you will leave home to find within you an infinite home.

And who will accompany me when the way falters and fall over the steep drops when I am blocked by desolate, forbidding walls?

And when friends disappear when no one is here when morning grows drear when it grows late when Death waits at the gate …

Who will accompany me?

Child,
I shall …

©Ingrid Andrew HeartsSong

Ingrid Andrew is a visionary, elemental poet performer. Ingrid regularly performs Survivors’ Poetry open mic nights. Ingrid is also the artist that raises the flyers for our open-mic night.

Hugh Ellacot

Hugh is the filmmaker and editor of these Survivors’ Poetry videos featured on the Vimeo website.

Hugh took up photography as a teenager, learning to print black and white photographs while at school. Subsequently he obtained a City and Guilds diploma in photography. The purchase of a video camera five years ago sparked a switch to moving images. He has read poetry from a young age, an interest inspired by his mother.

The opportunity in 2010 to become involved with Survivors’ Poetry by filming readings of Survivor poets has combined the two photographic interests.

Survivors’ Poetry is grateful for the work he does for us.
Rat trap

Darren’s on an ASBO from a mad show of macho acting like a bad bro always got to have a go showing off a shotgun – Ebay – got one easy as a pop gun now he’s up for action trip that trap trigger that snap when he got slack he smoked bad crack hijacked Asda demanding all the cash back shot the store manager smack through his bread head look at life banged up long-term brain dead Nigel has an i-Pod dad’s got a nice job bought him a hot rod he rode like his X-box right through a red light wallop! what a write-off when he gets his cast off he’s really gonna blast off trip that trap trigger that snap he’s acting like a C-list West End party guest slave to the free list name of Spartacus he drinks champagne like midnight rain a hatful of decadence protects him from the wind-change Karen’s got a damp head a cardboard camp bed embankment, pavement low rent maisonette gives her street cred rain’s her launderette a pit bull best mate guards her real estate trip that trap trigger that snap her midnight houseguests’ negative interest wrecks her bed rest leaves her repossessed change her address she could be an actress chained like a necklace to a big-mouthed rockstar I get born, get beat box clever, punch neat feel a bass earthquake underneath my own feet fired up, keep warm meet mates, leave home work for a pay cheque get drunk, stay stoned trip that trap trigger that snap get my income back suck it from the bank cos I’m taxed like a rat with a heart attack now you’ve got a widgit I’ve got a gadget if we’re itching let’s all scratch it yeah

Steve Tasane

The Last Sheep

She is the last sheep left in the pen. She is alone. A cheviot cross with a long lustrous fleece, regal roman nose, huge amber eyes the youths go in to get her, talking of other things, she hurls herself at the bars tries to force her body through a gap too small they close in on her, she flies at the gate head thudding against the top rail, the pens ring: they grab the sheep, wrestle her down -- joking about what’s for tea -- sit the ewe on her tail drag her from the pen, bleating for her flock, her lamb the shearer tugs the cord, the blades run down her belly towards intimate parts

Lydia Hill

Lydia Hill is a poet, wool maker, sheep shearer, teacher and business woman, living in Kent. ‘Fishing for Potatoes’ is her first poetry pamphlet published by Survivors’ Press in 2010. Available at our online bookshop. See the review of her pamphlet by Bernard M. Jackson on pg 25.
The Last Sheep

She is the last sheep left in the pen.
She is alone. A cheviot cross with a long lustrous fleece, regal roman nose, huge amber eyes the youths go in to get her, talking of other things, she hurls herself at the bars tries to force her body through a gap too small they close in on her, she flies at the gate head thudding against the top rail, the pens ring;
they grab the sheep, wrestle her down -- joking about what's for tea -- sit the ewe on her tail drag her from the pen, bleating for her flock, her lamb
the shearer tugs the cord, the blades run down her belly towards intimate parts

Lydia Hill

The pavement, from the sheer necessity And need to help him lift his load and for The pity of it all, and the people Passing to and fro, bewildered, lost, and The dissident and the disenfranchised And those who have simply nowhere to go.
Full fathom five, her own dreams lie trampled Into the ground where murmuring streams run Softening the stones, with no other care Than to be there, her back to the wind, to Somehow share his load. Nothing of him that Doth fade, but doth suffer a sea-change she Is Desdemona calling for her maid.
Anyone else would have given up long Ago, sighing by a sycamore tree, Sing willow, willow, my garland shall be.
How much I fall short of her courage, an Inestimable force that will never Waver, welling softly and endlessly
From the high depths of this godforsaken Universe, here where there is no longer Any lasting harbourage to be found,
Where the spirit has nowhere but the ground
On which to lay its head, a margin there, Scraped bare, the pavement of Parliament Square.
Unseen are the shadows that struggle, pressed Against the wall, pushed too far beyond their Own understanding, the futility
Of it all, the massive misalliance, The squares of the world's cities are full to Overflowing, crying with one voice for A freedom that will never come, freedom That can only be won with the last drop
Of their blood, their trampled lives, the bitter Fame of their fight for what they considered To be right. The light to ignite the voice Of protest is now the new world war and Whatever the cost, it will never be Extinguished, an underground stream that runs Softening the stones on its way even To the end of time. Sing willow, willow What can I bring to you who have given So much to the casualties of war?
Their memory can live forever more Because of Barbara and Brian Haw,
The nameless, the forgotten, the unborn,
The people that generations will mourn.
The heat, the cold, the pity of it all,
I who can only stand in your shadow
And the far ricochet of your echo.

Nb: The author is indebted to the Willow Song from Othello and to 'Ariel's Song' from The Tempest

Brenda Williams Power for Tania

You stood at the water’s edge the sea was wild as the Brighton sea can be - an errant wave caught you unawares and you, so small, barely more than another pebble on the beach, stamped your tiny foot and told the sea to go away then laughed with delight as the sea receded as if in deference and when the moon displeased you you said “Turn it off mummy, it’s staring at me”

and even as you spoke a friendly cloud drew across it as though in answer …

Oh, mistress of the moon
And the subservient sea, such power you have over the elements - what earthly chance have we

© Hilary Porter

Leeds

O my beloved city,
How many times have I deserted you For the sights and sounds of Babylon?
How often and from how far Have I conjured your broad boulevards O Quartier Latin, crowded street cafes With white and scarlet awnings, gold Adornings on stone cupolas, Byzantine domes And plinths of equine statuary before The Gare du Nord, grumbling fading Faience of the Gare de l’Est?

Often, O how often, did I mingle with your crowds Crossing the Pont Mirabeau in their Sunday best, Regretting my lost loves, watching the barges Snail along the Seine, hearing the bells Of the Angelus dawn?

Exiled in the south and in a new century,
I recall leisurely Sundays on the Grande Jatte;
The children in sun hats knelt by their boats Unfurling handkerchiefs for sails and for supreme farewells (Shall I return? Steamer with your poised masts Raising anchor for exotic climes?)
The bells of Sacré Coeur shake rickety tables Where old men in blazers sport the Légion d’Honneur.
Priests in birettas sip Green Chartreuse over their Breviaries while Wilde and Gide stroll round Père Lachaise vying to outdo each other’s tinted Memories of soft-skinned Moroccan boys.

Weary of their weariness and of my own, and of Rimbaud and Verlaine’s battle of strophe and Anti-strophe and rhetoric’s demise, I take a Lacquered tram to the Bois de Boulogne, hoping To catch Mistinguette’s last song.

Barry Tebb

Also featured on Vimeo is ‘Winterlight’ Joe Bidder is a mental health system survivor. He was born in Ripley, Surrey, raised in Ilford and has been living in Hackney, London, since 1984. In 1991 he co-founded of Survivors’ Poetry and was its Director until 1998. He co-edited “From Dark to Light” (Survivors’ Press) and co-ordinated the editorial team for “Under the Asylum Tree” (Survivors’ Press). He was Chairman of Arts Council England’s Arts and Disability Advisory Panel (1998-2003) and a member of its Literature Panel (1999-2003). He is a writer and critic in the fields of poetry and disability arts and is currently Chair of NDACA Co-op (National Disability Arts Collection and Archive). Previous poetry publications are “Eyes and Spirals” with Hilary Porter (Intercon), “Matter of Life and Death” (Zerо Books) and “Blue in Green”.

Drummer Boy

The drummer boy comes once more, Prances downstreet into my life.
Captive to his magic rhythm
I dismiss caution, grab some sticks To beat in slavish syncopation.

The drummer boy subverts Sycophantic fellow travellers, Slyly advances the downbeat, Increases tempo, demands obedience.
And like a vassal, I follow.

The road is strewn with ticker-tape and tinsel Evidence that someone had a good time.

Now I stare at drumsticks and snares, Trapped in lazy cross-rhythms.
I remember the drummer boy,
The excitement of dancing on the altar, Frightened of his return When like a vassal, I will follow.

Joe Bidder

Crack-Down Tribunal
(Re Jack Straw ‘Community Treatment Orders’ for the mentally ill)

Borderline Personality Disorder - Everybody welcome to the edge!
It’s the cripples’ convocation;
We’re the tin end of the wedge.

Rattling jars of medication cocktails, Pinballs batted in eternal circles,
Listen to the words of wisdom:
“Do what they tell you; don’t ask questions; Take what they give you, don’t ask question.”

It’s the Crack-Down Tribunal;
Of great sorrow be expectant.
Crack-Down Tribunal;
Governmental disinfectant!

Ever felt stuck with a discard label, Shred of we rag in the midnight drizzle?
Hope comes shining through the cracks;
The flames rise high as the hiccups fizzle.

Ever hammered on a DSS perspex panel, Been head on with some po-faced nerd
Who just can’t cope, so he ups the dosage;
Remember the voices that you heard -

Do you hear voices?
Do you hear voices?

It’s the Crack-Down Tribunal;
Of great sorrow be expectant.
Crack-Down Tribunal;
Governmental disinfectant!

Dave Russell

Crack-Down Tribunal:
Governmental disinfectant!

When the hypocritical is hippocratic,
The autocratic gets automatic,
So you’d better get mentally acrobatic And stuff your heads with anti-static!

It’s the Crack-Down Tribunal;
Of great sorrow be expectant.
Crack-Down Tribunal;
Governmental disinfectant!

Dave Russell

Dave Russell -
Editor of Poetry Express, singer-songwriter, poet, storyteller, painter - aspiring Polymath.
As typical of John Arthur, this selection is representative of a ‘divided focus’ on contemporaneity as against antiquity and mythology. As frequently, I would have appreciated the lyric texts provided in the inlay. Paying the Reapers has quite a heavy sound, with dubbed chorus. It concerns mortality and nostalgia for a self-sufficient agrarian economy (which may still exist, or be susceptible to revival). Robert the Ploughman’s son he echoes of Steeleye Span, largely concerning an old-time rakish folk-hero, though with an intrusion of the present day in “There was a time folk drove their cars up his arse.” He is also atypical in that he writes his poems by night. According to John, the ‘central question’ of this song is “... querying the essential nature of consciousness? Where does identity start and perception end? I recently read a book by Steven Pinker, neuro-scientist and pin-up, in which discussing consciousness, sentence, he grinds slowly to an embarrassed halt and says, At the moment we really have no idea how it comes about. Full marks to him for his honesty there! It’s a very important point for our times, one that you won’t find discussed on the BBC or in New Scientist.”

Reviews

John Arthur: A Life In the Outer Darkness

At the Desks: PJ Fahy, Andy Blake, Dominic Decicco, Simon Wring, Martin Brown

Mists of Evening Blue -Traditional tale of love requited and then rejected; but again (anachronistically?) the hero, Graham, describes himself as a tube train. My Parents is a lament (probably from an ageing person) for deceased relatives. It takes a flippant, self-consolatory attitude to the transitoriness of life, epitomised in the catchphrase ‘Dip, dip, dip’.

I Shrink Heads is a piece of pure black humour. The double-entendre of psychiatrist ‘shrinks’ and primitive trial headshrinkers is totally appropriate. A vivid portrayal of antique squalor with overtones of Sweeney Todd and Jack the Ripper, darkly terrorising their neighbourhood for heads to shrink. Jason (Of Wooded Hollow) is musically perhaps the most sensitive number in this selection, done mainly acoustically, with nifty harmonics and tasty instrumental break. Another antique, mythical character equipped with a ‘state of the art’ lawn mower! Final expression of optimism, ‘That one day we shall live the way we feel. Mersea to Thaxted, a journey of struggle in a bleak rural setting: “I must toil that for winter I’m prepared”. Smile of the Moon features some really nice cello. The Sundial Will Help You features some nice sitar at the start; then the number progresses to a more rocking rhythm; effective use of double-tracked vocals on the abrupt refrain. George Woods and Betty Green features some background birdsong, then goes into John Lee Hookerish mid-tempo. In the Palace Garden. I’m Bleeding for the Animals has a psychedelic opener, a touch of Beach Boys’ harmony, and an abundance of dramatic pauses. Elk is heralded by an echo of Duane Eddy, totally appropriate to its theme - the subject is a ‘harbour boy from a North English town who responds to a prompt to make a voyage of exploration - to the land of the elks where he becomes enthralled by terrain and main animals alike. Ride My Life has a grunge feel, with some excellent lead guitar, reflecting the theme of fighting a bitter struggle, but coming out on top: “My goesunder ranneth over, but now I laugh on the wings of my love”. I’ve Been Here Before is subtitled ‘a story of reincarnation’. The recent reincarnation is an aspiring woman pop star, the proceeding one a humble man who ‘elevated’ himself to be a footman for a dignitary, but felt frustrated because he had ‘capacities never put to the test’. The woman has a sense of déjà vu as she enters the studio. It is left to the listener to decide whether she is headed for spectacular success or for self-destruction. Musically, the influence of the Beatles’ White Album (especially Martha My Dear) is very much to the fore here, especially the vocal harmonies. Raan of Wharn tells the story of one who flees from servitude to a tyrant, and enters a neighbouring empire, whose emperor overthrows the realm of Wharn and frees the slaves. Musically, very Rolling Stones; some effective crowd noises dubbed on to the end. On the Vocal Fabric of a Rose is happily whimsical. I have heard many solo acoustic versions of Keeper of the Furry-Throated Wyvern. The backing here fleshes out what I find the best vocal performance on the album. Back to the black humour - of mock-heroic dragon-slaying, Spiderman has some very sensitive 12-string guitar - hint of Beatles/Beach Boys harmonies. A sensitive backing for a creepy theme - a malignant entity in a spooky, amorphous environment, where “Emptiness if form, and form is emptiness.”

All John’s albums are available free via his website: www.john-arthur.co.uk

Dave Russell

The Shallows

by Laura May, Chipmunka Publishing 2011

“Poetry, for me, is so expressive. When I was struggling through my teens, not knowing what was wrong with me, not understanding the mental health system, poetry came naturally. Now, I’m in my twenties and my first collection is being published, and it still seems so surreal that this lifeline has become more than just my own personal release.”

I hate going on about technicalities, but this book definitely merits an ISBN. There was also too much blank space at the beginning. The contents list and the section headings are very poorly designed. The opener, The Kitchen Table, evokes a piece of furniture as a repository and passive, inorganic chronicler of experience. Then more urgent tension takes over, with Clouds, which speaks with the voice of creative friction: “Your throat is thick with thoughts that won’t form, things you can’t say, as you struggle against the tide, the waves that hit as you try to breathe, try to smile.” Mind: this poem has been driven by painful necessity: “As you pull me in with your skin, /With your standards slipping and your spite blatant, /You force these words”. The last stanza is a tasteful vignette, playing on the concept of colour: “Blank page, run, /Before the ink does, /Creating another poem filled with you, /Filled with the orange hue /Of another sunset in the park. This device is reiterated in I am a Naked Wild Colour, where full analogies are made between personality traits and the colour spectrum: “I can be painted across any canvas.” Ruled Lines explores the idea of rulings in an exercise book being a metaphor for calm, placid order; she feels to some extent like a ‘ruled person’; but the power of real experience, in the shape of past violent kisses, and menacing drumbeats, threatens to break the mould in the interests of truth. Brittle rejects the stereotype of idyllic, tranquil childhood.

Think presents a disturbing hypothesis about what life would be like if the thinking process were removed. Peace recognises tranquility as being unattainable. My Name refers to the subject’s struggle with her mind; she would like to exist on the planes of pure sensation, but the mind prevails - all to the good, in my estimation. And Poetry Found Me: here, fittingly, poetry is shown as being double-edged: the ultimate disturber/challenger, and the road to calm: And in she stepped, /Forgotten thoughts released, /And screaming, /I met her in the farthest/Corner of each word. /And so I have escaped, /Taking her hand, /Into a world of /Clarity and contentment. Symptoms describes a heightened state, free from mind-control: “I am a goddess /Creating the universe in my image”. The partner in My Other Half is be a mirror-image, an alter ego. Edit, a poem about cutting/editing a film roll, compares the creative processes to the processes of daily living. Hey Baby is more simplistic than the other poems, and would perhaps stand best as a song lyric.

Two blank pages before the introduction to the next section, Body. This makes a quantum leap of intensity: My Own Heroin, to read, straddles the boundary between the literal and the metaphorical. It could be using the imagery of a powerful drug to convey the intensity of a personal attachment; according to the author, “that is purely illustrative, I have never experienced addiction to any drug.” The Fully Divided Heart makes ingenious use of medical imagery and the motif of dissection to depict the reality of divided feeling. These Strong Hands is a cry from the heart of someone afraid of her own strength: “the stars, the moon, /have all been wiped out.” Girl in the Bath is a stark poem, in the author’s words “ . . . based on an actual incident of self harm, where I cut myself so deeply I needed to go to hospital.” Two Legs, Two Arms is a profound exploration of platonic ideals: every individual has two faces, as he/she has two limbs; the interaction of the two faces is a vital prerequisite of individual functionality. The Girl is a gloss on the idea of ‘inner child’. Here the two entities are utterly interdependent; the child needs the adult’s exterior organs in order to be articulate. Paper Thin refers to the poet’s thin skin; she has a compulsion towards self-harm and reopening old, scarred wounds. Old Songs presents another side of ‘hearing voices’ (even though they are specified as ‘Not voices’. There follows The Shallows - title poem of this collection; one can drown in shallow water. Still in the aquatic element is My River of Rage, where the subject’s elemental, many-faced alter ego assumes the form of a torrent - the most overtly romantic poem of this collection. Laura has a great love for water in all forms; it is a recurrent theme in her work.

Breathe presumably refers to an oxygen tube. Norma refers to obsessive adoration, of an idol - Norma Jean (Marilyn Monroe). The poet rationally recognises that the attraction is based on a surface fraction of Norma, and yet its very intensity justifies the feeling: “But who I am to change legends, /To ask for a different ending?” Too Blue is an extremely subtle poem: it suggests both a dying/post mortem entity and the desire, unattainable, to be one: “the sky was too blue/To hold all the secrets of my heart,/So I had to let them out.” It seems there is a restoration of/return to, mortal life. Dark romanticism again with Sweetest, where absorption in love is equated with drowning: “you drown in me./And it is the sweetest turn blue.”

Heart: Ribbons, the opener, is about unrequited longing: the heart has been cut to ribbons, but the ribbons are enormously beautiful; beauty and pain are vitally interlinked. Collide is, in some ways, in counterpoint to Sweetest: here the beloved is the reassuring presence, countering the sweep of the tide. Mortar and Pestle explores the surgical and pharmaceutical areas. The heart is ground to powder, as part of an attempt at transformation - into a ‘Baba Yaga’ – in Slavic folklore, a witch who flies around on a giant pestle and kidnaps small children. But the organic matter of the heart is ultimately proof against the pummelling. Duckling: this one really does feel ugly, and yearns for growth: “Like an old lullaby,/the water rocks beneath me,/but it doesn’t hold me close./Because I’m like the ugly duckling,/I don’t belong, I don’t bond/with this coarse world . . .” Lost Lover concerns the memory and or illusion of a lover: “I have to leave before I lose you” – the illusion might be destroyed if she stayed. She aches for painful reality: let me hurt you,. / Let me tear at skin and bones and us . . .” but knows the illusion would vanish if she made the request in reality. Luxuries touchingly describes the process of recovery; the poet thinks back on some material luxuries in the past, but then compares them to the real luxuries of health after being ‘under diagnosis’. In Charade, the poet is shown as being in the grip of an obsessive attachment; she longs to place this at a safe distance, but her organic being keeps it painfully there: “. . . I taste blood, metallic, in my mouth,/And I realise my heart has burst/trying to let you back in.”

Caught enters the realm of the pains of inspiration, a fleeting, elusive song that cannot be captured in writing. Assisted keeps the reader guessing; there is a suggestion that the poet has found peace by doing some sort of wrong. This poem refers to a ‘prophet’ who organised a mass suicide pact in America and ‘assisted’ the deaths of his parishioners. Here Laura is emphasising that nobody has ever pushed her to, or assisted her in, self-harm. Ambiguous focus in Undone: does the poet want to hold on to a lover, or to her own separate life after that lover has gone? Amica - another tender lover who repaired and returned a broken heart. The phrase “…you know no red lights, as promised in the history” suggests a variety of interpretations. 5/9 - desire to be wrapped up in guilty secrecy with a lover, and facing the concomitant pain: “Under your bruises/I wait to turn blue.” Foolish Devotion - the sheer literality of this brief poem speaks volumes: “. . . after days of building myself up again/You shattered me.” Sparrow is about a one-sided, possessive relationship; the poet is a free spirit who steadfastly refuses to be treated as a domestic pet.

Soul: The Great First Lines - Laura is deeply attached to the poetic greats, in a way that makes her catechism totally meaningful: “I want the great first lines written across my body,” I’m sure some tattoo lovers have actually done this. Dear J - a dedication to someone often confided in, with great admissions of faults and wrongs, but a determination to get the better of them: “I’m trying, dear J, /to look closer at my palms, /to explore my restless finger tips, /to hold my hands steady.” This poem was inspired by letters written over the years to Laura’s best friend Jay. Another Hope - another one-sided attraction: “I am pathetically grateful for your indifference,/Though I can never walk away/In you I can never take off my watch,/And wander in your woe and love and crime,/Because I’d lose myself/In the beauty and love and grime.” There is a dual fascination, with the image and reality of the partner, and with the solitary desolation without that partner - who is actually ‘London’ itself as a city; the poet had a great love for London in her younger years. When I’m Happy - literal, straightforward, and somewhat singable! All I Can Carry is a highly spiritual and existential piece: “Let happiness hit me like a bullet”; she wants her ‘stars of illusion’ to be burned out, and the slate of her sensory world wiped clean: “Build up these clear walls,/Let the dawns and dusks fade.” Let Me Make It: the utterly divided feelings intrinsic to everyone’s everyday struggle for existence: “Hoping I won’t make it, won’t care,/but I do care, let me make it, please.” Betrayal - divided feelings again: ‘a daughter of deception’ suggests both victim and perpetrator; but this role gives her almost superhuman qualities: “I am blind, as only the gods can be,/Reflecting the mistakes of man./I am a mirror of betrayal.” This poem is based very loosely around Shakespeare’s play ‘King Lear’, which shows the betrayal by his daughters as he embraces madness. London Bridge is happily simplistic, expressing pure feelings against a backdrop of urban squalor. The Lost Sonnet is an uncomplicated set of reflections on the onset of night. Catching is happily whimsical - the poet finding herself to be an utterly elusive entity. Inspiration is a desperate plea for determination and integrity “. . . when the lonely soul,/Needs a hand” . . . sometimes in apparent conflict with daily living: “Rot away, great beauty and art,/though remember your duty,/When the time comes,/The world will call on you,/To inspire her once again,/As you have each man of worth,/that hides in your attic.” Each Dream - dream image of an elusive lover. Settle on My Shoulders: A day of living feels like a blanket: “. . . this covering is accepted with the greatest reluctance: when I am not/ready, Not ready to soak myself in dreams. . .” Goodnight B refers to an unusual sort of alter ego, who will be happy and fulfilled when free of its mirror-ego. This poem is actually dedicated to Laura’s partner, Brooke, trying to explain to her why she hurt herself in the past: “it is not personal, when I am unwell I just genuinely believe she would be better off without me.”
This collection is highly challenging, and full of perceptive insights. I feel that the title does not do it full justice as it negotiates so many depths. In her own words: “I have a diagnosis of borderline personality disorder and bipolar, and explore the symptoms and every day challenges I face with these conditions.”

Find out more about Laura May at www.lauramay.com

Dave Russell

There’s a Fine Line by Teresa Joyce

Chipmunka Publishing 2010
ISBN: 978-1-84991-185-6. £5.00 (e book); also available in paperback £12.00

This work embraces the themes of abuse, breakdown and bereavement, expresses emotions in total depth while clinically putting them in their domestic and environmental context.

“People would be hurt both physically and mentally. No one was safe if they stood in the way of my stepfather and what he claimed was his. I would be abused and blackmailed unable to stop or control anything going on around me; I felt that the only way out would be to check out on life completely and it seemed a welcoming prospect. Running from memories of all those years living by his rules, buried so deep within me I never really remembered or faced until I was forced to do so.” (Press Release)

About The Book: The subject of my book covers more than one issue; it’s a true story that ranges over a period of many years. It covers the first married years of my mother’s life, and the abuse she received from my now deceased father. The hardship she found within her life in so many ways, no one should have ever had to go through, but sadly it just seemed to follow her around. Some years later she remarried, but unfortunately this union would tear her once more into tiny pieces. She would see everything slipping away from her. Was her husband really having an affair with her daughter? It seemed to her that was the case, why would he lie? It would see the breakdown of her complete family unit, scattered to the wind without care.

My Thoughts: “This book is a memoir, unfortunately what this woman had to endure is not a work of fiction. How do you review someone’s real life? The author of this book is brave, having to relive these horrific memories to tell us her story. The stories told in this book are unbelievable, to think that someone can be so heartless, so manipulative. ‘Teresa’ had to deal with the devil himself. ‘There’s a fine line’ will take you down a dark road, a road that no one should ever have to travel. The author tells her story in so much detail and emotion that you feel as if you are standing right there with her. While reading the book I couldn’t help but get emotional, I got sad, happy but most of all angry, I was angry because of the situation she was forced in and at her stepfather. A lot of people will take something from this book, even people that haven’t been in a situation like this. It’s hard to think that life can go on after a tragedy or a horrific crime or something else life changing/shattering, but it does and the author is proof of that. It’s a giant step that a person has to make to move forward, everyone has their own methods that suit them best, the authors was this book. The rawness and vulnerability is etched into every word. The events that take place in this book are heavy, no doubt, but I think a person could take a great lesson from this book. I am glad I had the opportunity to read There’s a Fine Line.” (Review in The Crazy Bookworm)

* * *

As a piece of autobiography, this work is exceptional. It was a completely solo effort, but that one person has a superbly observant, monitoring mind which keeps a clinical appraisal of the situation. Through all the depths of trauma, there is no weakening of lucidity.

Teresa remained deeply attached to her mother throughout her life. She lost her natural father when she was very young: he had been a violent alcoholic, and indeed she was born prematurely because he had kicked her mother in the stomach when pregnant. The family was in the deepest poverty. The stepfather appeared on the scene, very charming and charismatic, and holding the keys to material prosperity. The action unfolds in the context of a ‘family business’, where domestic and workplace tensions impinge on each other to an extreme degree. Because of being entrenched in both areas, the Stepfather is able to keep her under constant surveillance, forever pestering her with phone calls when she was not in immediate physical proximity.

He undertakes a sustained and calculated attempt to corner, brainwash and seduce her. They end up with a physical relationship which falls short of full intercourse (He would have to kill me before I had full sexual intercourse . . .”). She decided to pretend to be sympathetic to his advances in order to slow him down. These manoeuvres, unjustly, gave Teresa a sense of guilt, and she felt constrained to keep a painful secret, mainly for fear of hurting her mother. There was the further problem of containing a conflict between her husband and her stepfather, and she had to protect her son. In the course of this tension, her husband remained cold and apathetic; in return, her feelings for him evaporated. So to a degree she colluded with the Stepfather’s actions. She felt utterly degraded by this: “I became no-one”. She turned to self-loathing. Her husband seemed indifferent to her situation. She was put on a dosage of multiple pills and proposed resigning from her job. Then, forced into overwork, she had a fall, through which she fractured her coccyx and prolapsed both her L4 and L5 discs; as a consequence, she could not return to work. She certainly contemplated suicide: “with me out of the way, people would be able to restore their lives”.

Her stepfather told her mother that Teresa had seduced him; she was accused of expressing her natural father’s bad character traits. On the side, he remains sadistic, smashing up Teresa’s car.

In the light of these stresses, Teresa began to explore her lesbian tendencies. Her mother recognised this tendency, and pointed out that many people have bisexual potential.

The first, transitory, lesbian relationship was complicated. The partner wanted children; at a point of high stress she tried to persuade Teresa to go to Psychiatric Hospital. There was a heavy confrontation with her partner’s parents, where the father threatened her. Teresa mistakenly told her mother of this threat; she duly informed the stepfather, who attacked the partner’s father. He had used a baseball bat and not the gun which he had in his car. He was arrested, but for some unknown reason the police dropped the case.

Her second, long-term and fulfilling, lesbian relationship was with a close school friend she had known since she was 11, who always found her a source of strength, and they ‘came out’.

There is one excruciating act of self-mutilation; her stepfather chops his finger off. The husband demands sole custody of the son.

Her mother has to be hospitalised, and was abominably treated there, being left for a week suffering from septicaemia without proper treatment. She has to be moved to another hospital for an MPI scan. Teresa loyally attends. The mother dies; Stepfather is not invited to the funeral. Through a bitter irony of fate, Teresa’s consultant was her mother’s surgeon.

Her dilemma with her Stepfather continues. He had written to her mother explaining how he had behaved with Teresa, who was reluctant to read a letter which would clear her name; some irrational guilt remained. The emotional blackmail continued: Stepfather continued to feed money into Mother’s bank account, to keep a hold. At that point the Stepfather was still in control of her Mother’s well being and also her source of income. She had very bad Rheumatoid arthritis for many years, and had been ill-health retired from her Stepfather’s company. Before this she had been Company Secretary. She was so scared of him taking away her pension income, that he still had hold of the strings playing me like a puppet, even when so far away. If Teresa were to upset him. . . then he would remove that income.

He was ‘always a great tactician’ – ruthlessly manipulative to the very end, even in the face of death. Profound reflections on immortality at the end: “If there is a higher place, then maybe we also need to believe the opposite is true . . . the direction my stepfather would take when leaving this world is very far from a sure thing.”

Teresa is incredibly up-front in confronting the reader with all the problems in coming to terms with, writing about her experience: “I will of course reach that point where I share this with you . . . about to embark on the road of self-hate - replaying every dirty moment. I deluded myself that I could change the past.

“It’s a story that resembles hell and it was her life for many years, as such she is equipped with everything she needs, to help you relate to the madness which ensued. Although this has been extremely difficult for her to write, her hope is that someone out there may take some strength from it’s content, if finding themselves in a similar situation. This memoir is just a little different to most other memoirs i.e. most are written by ghost writers. This was something she never even considered. To her mind she had to be the one to write this. She hoped and needed to be able to express her feelings within its pages, as no other person could. With the best outcome being, you would feel like you were taking this journey with her. Strangely she feels an amount of support, at being able to think that you are out there. There is a fine line between sanity and insanity; she knows this personally, through the experiences she has had to go through involving her stepfather. She also has a personal insight of her own, of a mind battling to stay on the right side of that line, because in truth, she came so very close to crossing over herself.” (Publisher’s blurb)

True to life, in a way, the account is not a simple, linear narrative. There are frequent flashbacks - such as at the beginning of Chapter 11, where the narrative focuses on Teresa’s 11th year, and her close school friend who became a Lesbian lover. A trauma often has the effect of recalling a comparable root experience in the past.

Another flashback at the beginning of Chapter 13 ‘when I was still in the marital home’. At this time the Stepfather discovered ‘spirituality’ and went off on his pilgrimages. He sold the company (the relations’ jobs remained temporarily secure there), and found another partner, by whom he had a child. Mum remained steadfastly devoted to him.

The author is incredibly honest about the problems and struggles of written composition. Take her introduction to Chapter 4:

“This chapter for me will be the hardest thing I ever hope to write. It has taken me days just to return to my computer to try to do so. I know I have to write this and in doing so, I will leave myself wide open. It will be like walking back into the lion’s den. Neither is it trying to hide my shame, because even to this day I rightly blame myself. I expect anyone reading this would also take that line. I am not going to stretch this out more than I need to do so, but the facts have to be digested so you can formulate an image of the madness which was to ensue for yourself. Sitting here, I can feel the palms of my hands sweating; my heart seems to be beating just that little bit faster. How can I write this down? But I know I have to. There needs to be an end to this and I have to try to reach it, without destroying myself in the process.”

“After an accident in which I injured my back, I was ill health retired. This has given me the time and dedication to put pen to paper. My life was no longer full, and I found myself with an abundance of alone time, to sit and reflect everything I had tried so hard to bury. Although this has been extremely difficult for me, my hope is that anyone finding themselves in the same type of situation may take some strength from its content. If this book were to be catalogued where would it fall, a true account, a personal autobiography or self-help? The real truth is in all three.

“Whilst writing, I was forced down a road that I never really wanted to walk again. It’s an insight to the lengths someone will go to achieve their goal. At times I had to walk away to deal with the emotions that it invoked. To say this person was very unhinged would be an understatement. Teetering on the edge of insanity, and crossing over more times than I can count. Where everyone else involved just became fall out. It was as if I were being pursued by the devil himself. Overly more there seemed to be nothing I could do to stop him and the destruction he left in his wake.

“The facts within are very hard to believe, but believe it I must because I was there. It’s still incredible to me to think that I came out of it the other side. I have spent many years under the mental health care umbrella, while trying to deal with the enormous sociological and psychological residue it has left behind.”

This work stands out like a beacon for Survivors. It should have come out under the Survivors Press imprint. There must be many others struggling to come to terms with their traumatic experiences who would find a role model here. I find Teresa Joyce fully comparable with Kona McPhee in being exceptionally reader-friendly, and up front about the labours, stresses and strains of extended composition. She, again like Kona, is very keen to communicate with Survivors.

Dave Russell

Fishing for Potatoes - Lydia Hill Ed Peter Carpenter
Price £5-00 pp 40
Published by Survivors’ Press
ISBN; 978-1-874595-31-1

As I lift the first forkful, the hole fills with water I throw the mud aside, looking for clues, the dead haulms poking up promise buried tubers.

Fishing for Potatoes

The remarkable verse of enigmatic, Devon-born poet, Lydia Hill, though finely crafted, precise in detail, and notable for the keenness of its often graphic imagery, is nevertheless engendered by an underlying search for Self, within the scope of an immediate world in which the time-scale of life experience is seen to include the genetic influence of preceding generations. And there are, indeed, striking parallels to be discovered here, as the title poem so readily determines:

I grope in the murk with bare hand, pull up stones of hard mud, potatoes Sunk over my ankles shovelling, I recall grandfather and all the men who dug for survival at the Somme - globbs splat, the fork is impossibly heavy, nothing to lever against, the handle slides.

Lydia had long been fascinated with fateful anecdotal instances (previously recounted by her father) concerning a grandfather who had died before she was born: His survival from those horrendous conditions of military action in the trenches during the 1914-1918 First World War. His chance first meeting with Lydia’s grandmother and, not least, Her grandfather’s heroic exploits during that later Second World War (1939-1945):

An old sepia man in Home Guard uniform, Yet many more years to live - Oh why could you not have waited for me?

I would love to have heard your yarns,
I would love to have sat on your knee.

Whatever the future might show
The abject futility of war occupies several of Lydia’s included poems, as she scathingly deplores the tragic loss of the young flowering of English manhood- in that Great War, almost a century ago. Much of her poetry, however, reflects life and work within a rural farming community. One of her longer poems, ‘The Hedge Laying Competition’, gives informed, detailed, stage by stage development, as a hedge is gradually rooted and intertwined; and so striking is this verse account that one-is left with absolutely no illusion as to Lydia’s obvious involvement in matters of agricultural import.

The first stem is shaken free, the first pleacher cut with a four pound axe.
He lays the stem out (later it will be lifted in): he stops to plan his next move, buzzes off an inconvenient trunk, drags it free, crunching across the frost to start a waste pile.

The Hedge Laying Competition
Her love of animals, particularly farm stock, is self-evident as she deeply empathises with their sufferings, and quietly grieves over their being eventually singled out for slaughter:
No pain relief, no tending of the wound, only a shot of antibiotic, a burst of blue spray on top of the dirt.
She’ll go for slaughter once she’s raised her lambs.

Sorting the Sheep
Meanwhile, in much lighter vein, we have that very entertaining 5-verse description of ‘a dark chestnut Sussex bull’ lording it among a field of potentially-amorous Holstein cows (‘Love in a field of meadow ladies’). It is this poet’s admirable ability to link up prevailing images and the disparate strands of interest and subject material, throughout her studiously assembled verse offerings, that marks out this opus as poetry of top drawer quality. And it should be mentioned that Lydia Hill’s incursions into the starker side of life are not without the brighter accompaniment of pleasing turn of phrase and succinctness of expression. I look forward to reading more of this talented writer’s excellent verse, in the very near future.

Available from http://www.survivorspoetry.org/bookshop/

Bernard M. Jackson - International Review Writer

This year, daffodils. A collection of Haiku by Girija Shettar

Ed Diana Webb, Published by Survivors’ Press
ISBN 978-1-874595-30-4
Price: £5

In recent years, that ubiquitous Japanese poetry form, the Haiku, formerly named ‘Haiku’, has gained in popularity to such a considerable extent that Haiku societies have become well-attended literary establishments almost universally. And yet, the very nature and structure of this ancient poetry form is ever open to widespread debate and discussion as to its actual required composition-The purist, of course, will ever stoutly maintain that essentially the Haiku must consist of three brief, unpunctuated lines made up of 5, 7 and 5 syllables respectively. Also, it would be subsequently needed that there be a seasonal reference included. However, many of our present-day poets now prefer not to be hidebound by any former 17-syllable directive for such poems, and Girija Shettar has emerged as one of the talented exponents of the modern minimal Haiku revolution. Koran of mixed parentage, Girija’s small poetic gems very much reflect the culture and Indian background of a proud family tradition:

old, new, rich and poor Bombay’s. soul
under our slippers

It will be noted that none of these poems (a number of which are in related sequence) has a title, and this, again, is accepted procedure. The Haiku can be considered as an invitation to reflect or meditate on a given idea or concept, and this element is admirably conducted by this writer, for unlike many of her contemporaries, Girija, in her endeavours to create the clearer image and corresponding sense of purpose, has effectively managed to avoid any morning drifters robing us in saffron the Indian light tendency to obscurity of representation:

blackbird flies up drops down my thought suspended
under our slippers

I was very much taken with the seasonal atmosphere, so prevalent in a number of these poems:

under pale grey skies ink flows on the haiku pad gentle rain

And do take note of the effective change of cadence in that powerful third line. Readers will soon become aware that within the framework of comparatively few words, Girija is well-able to express movement, stillness and extent of area and distance. Not only that, but in the following poem there is a pleasing sense of texture conveyed:

Shining in the wind a line of silk between the canes

A number of Girija’s haiku are studiously devoted to bird imagery, amongst which, I very much admired the following example, which would be quite meaningful to any who have ever found joy in observing birds in flight under differing seasonal conditions:

hurled into the storm two gulls on silver wings
-balance

And here, with this dramatic single word third line conclusion, we are able, not only to bring to mind the powerful intensity of a stormy wind, but we become one with the arresting change of pace and corresponding momentary suspension of gulls in flight.

- A lovely haiku!

Whether one holds dogmatically; to the traditionally accepted 17-syllable form of the Haiku, or readily welcomes the modern free -form variety of these poems, Girija’s poems have much within to merit commendation ; for, after all is said and done, ‘a rose by any other name is still a rose.’

— An excellent, finely crafted collection of minimal poems.

Available from http://www.survivorspoetry.org/bookshop/

Bernard M. Jackson -International Review Writer

---

All Over the Shop

Peter Mackie (Piano, Synthesiser and Occasional Voice) produced by Ivor Johnstone, Soundhire Scotland

“All the music on this CD offers the listener Peter’s unusual musical perceptions. It defies most musical categories. In the tunes and melodies are aspects of jazz, rock and classical music. It features wry musical and aural references to literature, Krapp’s Last Tape, and folk music; Greensleeves: neither will ever be quite the same again! Shades of Ivor Cutler, Wild Man Fisher, Keith Tippett and even our late lamented Frank Zappa, or, to quote Peter’s Rain Waterfall, “and now love, beauty and madness reigns.” (Alan Dearling, Enabler Publications)

This collection shows remarkable imagination and versatility, from someone determined to make full use of the synthesiser’s resources. The most imaginative track is Forest Improvisation, where he uses multiple stops. He spans the gamut - from raucous depth to ethereal delicacy.

I have only two major criticisms of the production:
to me, the vocals sound indistinct. Secondly, there are 12 tracks on the album, but only 2 tracks register on the CD player. Perhaps this could be remedied on the occasion of a reprint.

The first two tracks sounded a little stiff. Rain Waterfall has a Hammond organ sound; the double-tracking of the vocals is effective, but they are mixed down. Strange Animals uses the harpsichord stop. It sounds hesitant, and could have done with some more arpeggios in the treble.

Thereafter Peter gets into his stride. Jazz Improvisation shows he has a substantial jazz background, with which he seems at ease. All over the Shop and Try to be Free (with its gospel feel) are instrumentally quite bright, but marred by mixed-down vocals. Waves of Space is in ¾ time; after a pedestrian start there is a switch to a faster tempo, then back to the slow movement of the beginning.
Krapp’s Last Tape is a favourite of mine. His use of the piano stop gives it a ‘period’ feel; one feels one could be listening to a recording made in the 30s or 40s. Some imaginative chord progressions too - and some striking discords; Peter has a good jazz sense; he is at his ease in this idiom.
His rendition of Greensleeves, to me, brings a tired melody back to life, with much exploration, some jazzing up, and a substantial amount of Debussy thrown in. Bicycles of Evolution reiterates the Greensleeves melody to some extent, but makes more experiments with tempo changes. There is also great variety in the sound, including drum roll and fuzz bass. Great progression from harp, to celesta and vibraphone; quite a Balinese effect in some places.

Hungarian Rhapsody: great ‘gypsy’ effect, with accelerating tempo, and meditative runs down chromatic scale. Sound begins with Hammond organ, then to pipe organ, then to harp, back to pipe organ, back to harp.

Forest of Life Improvisation: this is highly enterprising indeed - the full keyboard orchestra! Opening with the brass sound, then to flute, ‘natural’ wind, banjo, bass drum. Some excellent glissandi en route Then a rapid alternation between organ, xylophone, harp, harpsichord, brass (or electric guitar?) Nice discordant effect with strings. Then Hammond organ, digital choir, harpsichord, celesta, brass, breathy flute a bit like ‘Los Incas’, xylophone with some nice chromatics - all based on a quasi-flamenco chord progression. Beautiful phasing from strings, to choir, to organ - musique concrete discords, rasping flute sound, electric guitar. Lovely run down the scale against the background of a syncopated, broken rhythm.

I found the final song track, Forest of Life, a bit of an anticlimax after the splendor of its predecessor, though it is lifted by a key and tempo change before the end.

All in all, this is a marvelous role model for any imaginative home recorder with a keyboard.

To obtain a copy, contact petermackie@hotmail.com

---

Particular by Peter Vealey

Published by Chipmunka, ISBN 9781849915144 £10

This 60-poem selection is, in the author’s words, ‘Unashamedly compassionate, politically thought-provoking and observational’, expressing his ‘socialist beliefs’. He gave it that title because it is particular to his persuasions.

Opener is All the glossy panaceas indicts the emptiness of politicians’ rhetoric, in the light of ‘the death wish in us all’ and ‘the brutal history of mankind’. Amy (all I wanted was you to be human) - a longing for the real in a universe dominated by the ephemeral Arteries explores the metaphor of the arterial road - the main channels of communication, now utterly corrupted, ‘a modern communications nightmare’. Blonde Bimboesque is a bitter comment on the pursuit of ephemeral ‘fifteen minute fame’. Perhaps it should go more into exploring the reasons for that fame’s allure.

Cacti Corner seems to refer to a bar, or place of ill repute, where people go when en route to their doom. Some pithy observations on drab contemporary life in Capitalism Blues and “Commuterville”. Rather a cynical gloss on the structure of relationships in Couples; lampooning of the capriciousness of the electorate in “Different Perspectives”, and jingoistic nostalgia in Empire state of mind.

Eternity’s moment with me is in more speculative vein. Long motor journeys, including protracted traffic jams, do give one time to reflect and get to the essence of some music and literature, and the deeper significances of the universe: “Eternity has deserted us/Just as we deserted eternity/For an existence of mistaken fraternity.”

Reference to his Irish roots in From our frailties within - enhanced by one of his excellent photographs. G20 (Level Playing Field) speculates on social polarities. “I’m all right jackism” expresses, none too optimistically, the struggle for well-being.

If peace was an army - some clever handling of irony, paradox and contradiction. Some philosophical depth in Immortal: “We all feel we are/Immortal as/Money flashing down the drain.” There is a great feeling of powerlessness in face of the inexorability of time - and the universe: “We all feel this place is/Unbreakable . .
A speculative mind comes to the fore in Inferences: “Inferences are drawn/By the slow drip of bias and prejudice.” Knitwork: knitting the fabrics of life and society? Some really penetrating phrases here - “. . . the tired pith of days./Drunken anaesthesia and pledges.” Land of the Ghouls - I like the phrase ‘polished phonies’. Limited Consciences - a great aphorism-guide to survival in a bad world: “In the land of the limited conscience,/Thoughtlessness is king.” Natureforce: this highlights humanity’s helplessness under the canopy of the heavens - ‘free will or not’ . . . “Where fortune is stemmed, / Then ebbs away . . . All you now hopes and dreams/ Are no sedative/ On its life-force/Now or ever.” Neighbours is a plea for a warmer, more positive expression of humanity, which “. . . should be more/ Than an old-fashioned ideal.” He protests: “So why are the lights/ Always on red?” Newspeak (term taken from Orwell’s 1984) indicts the manipulative oppressiveness of tabloid journalism: “All we need to do is keep grinding/ Everyone’s hoped down./While looking right and strong,” “On Committee”: Humanity can be full of ingratitude - a dedicated public servant indeed . . . “But when I died,/ No one came to/ Thank me.” Outstripping: the struggle to break out of stifling stereotypes. Over the rainbow relates the tragedy of 9/11 to Hollywood and pop music nostalgia. Paper Tigers refers to imprisonment by language: “Words are empty . . .” but “you can never be more than they”. Passing Hero: a past hero who has now reached old age, and bleak anonymity.

Quangoitis: in case anyone has forgotten or does not know, Quango is short for ‘Quasi-Autonomous Non-Governmental Organisation’ - absurd ‘independent’ advisory committees. Their pathetic absurdity is bitterly lampooned - ‘. . . splashing clumsily downstream . . .’ Saplings are a visible sign of the resurgence and resilience of nature amid desolation and desperation, ‘carnage and regret’. There is a cynical irony about ‘. . . the old trusted values/ Of displacement,/ And confused disheartenment.’ Sleeping in a sane hell explores the theme of decay and mutability, of human bodies and of those edifices which house them. Stigma I found somewhat opaque. It seems to relate to self-recrimination - ‘the knocking shop of hate’. Tea and rock cake mornings presents a panorama of the comforts and stresses of today’s up-tempo city life, the counterpointing of elegance and squalor. Tender trees are contrasted with brutal humanity “Where respectability/Bites and never ends”. The Framework: sense of futility, ‘Catastrophic rooms of no power.’ The laughter of desperation: that releaser of tension can be completely inhuman: “It’s like a skeletal/Death rattle.”

The Power behind the Throne suggests Margaret Thatcher to me; a cynical view of radical reform: “Anything is possible./Except for ‘revolution’ in the UK.” The Seductive world of advertising “. . . is all encompassing/and incomplete/As starched fodder. Some double-entendre in The Whitewashers - launderers who keep people pristine smart, covering up a multitude of vice and propagandists who edit out the embarrassing bits. Thusandthem parodies the hypocritical evasiveness of politicians; in the desired, hypothetical world of ‘thus and them’ there are no divisions; divisions persist indefatigably in the real world. Tinseland could relate to ‘idealist’, ‘futuristic’ building projects; wholesome ‘natural’ chaos and darkness are preferable. To fill newspapers (to sell copy) explores the traditional double role of newsprint: as fish and chips wrappers and as purveyors of spurious, sensationalistic news. Very moving tribute to John Lennon; I agree with the sentiment that he was underrated, and that his destruction was symptomatic of a world in decay. Trust status looks critically at the dictatorial nature of some public corporations “Overlooked by Rottweiler’s in designer suits./Formerly of right-wing think-tanks.” Humility is ‘so redundant’ - how true!

To this poet, the restorative power of flowers shrinks in the perspective of love, hate, blood & water. Unthinking - a good literal environmentalist poem. Whistleblowers and Snitches highlights the inadequacies of the Christian Moral right, and the problems they failed to tackle. Wise Owl Blues is a cynical reflection on cyclic permanence and the eminently criticisable need for nostalgia. Within suits waxes whimsical about uniforms and uniformity.

Dave Russell

TheFED Writing Festival

An annual full day feast of creative writing and art therapy workshops

Saturday 5th November 9.30–6.00pm

Faraday House
(London Premises of Syracuse University) 48-51 Old Gloucester Street London WC1N 3AE

Contact: the.fwwcp@gmail.com for further information, as TheFED will soon be launching the list of workshops available.

Fee: £10–Members, £15–Non-Members

There will be something for everyone.
All levels welcome.

http://www.thefed.btck.co.uk/
Sean Burn's poetry takes on some of the (forgive the pun) forward slash and burn polices of 1970s modernism, and his poetry thus lives in these brief breaks, as if pauses in a telegraph. This way, language was configured as a continuum un-mutilated by bourgeois line-breaks. The trouble lies in its unrelenting appearance: jumped-down prose, difficult to negotiate. Burn has solved this beautifully by keeping his 'entries' short.

The inherent tension of this style is intensified by first, the jump-cut associative material, a kind of poetic aleatoric counterpoint (two musical notations unsynchronized, in different parts of the orchestra, as in Lutoslawski); but more tightly choreographed. And by the pressures of the time from which these texts arise. Specifically, they're exercised by the news, and the everyday reporting of world-wide conflicts; particularly Iraq, in the spring of 2008, five years on from the invasion, now contemplating pull-out.

Thus the pressure on language is two-fold: formal, which intensifies its associative leaps and fractures the discrete material further. And by the news items flooding Burn's consciousness that he turns round to creative account as an act of salvage, redemption, coherence and pattern. That he should subject himself to this diurnal, almost calendrical riot of how shit happens, is remarkable enough. What's more important is that the process, remarkable as it is, isn't where the poetry directs us, as happens in much experimental work. Burn sears the particular nerve-ends of sentences and phrases into something patterned, consistent (the news is over a brief span) and electrifying.

A notable success is for instance his lyrical third 'entry':

30/3 all refugees together this ravaged / city the lapis lazuli – most precious skies / spark sung cherry tree too-too / militias ordered off shia streets / stagger thru interrogations, line up in headlights, hands in surrender always / e-mocracy suicides, uniforms change / guerillas wound, are wounded by their very nature / in the forbidden zones never enough paper / lit from below, exploding on up, exposed brilliant unders / entering the lighter half / kids hurl a ball repeatedly thru window

This is mostly congruent. Light – the jeweled sky, the headlights, even the de-fenestrated windows, all let in light. But it's used first as sheer lyrical affirmation, with astonishing beauty; then subverted into headlights and casual 'allied' torture. This morphs two ways, through politics (the illusion of democracy, or 'e-mocracy') and the banning of paper (also light-suffused?) and the casual existential emptiness of a ball through a window.

Such concatenations fuse the moments memorably in a way no other poet has achieved in this mode. The first entry is more problematic:

28/3 chords of bluster, fields of red, so much percussion stutter / weapons amnesty's extend in iraq / no real news / just a leaf on wind up-ending, suspended above heads / skin crackles, the cellophane-unwrap, the giggle off-centre / and whisperings always at edges vision / conflicts needed for theatre / yet the dalai lama is the most unconflicted i can conjure / meds blister packs re-designed / no longer naming days over each pill / and so we stumble and tumble / bones growl overgrazing nights / histories amber columns waiting / like i said, chords of bluster, fields of red

Here is something litanic, which returns to its opening phrase, heavier with the weight of where it's been. It also recalls his inherently dramatic writing – Burn writes award-winning plays and working with actors has intensified his dramatic formalism, but twisted with the flexibility of theatrical writing.

The theme here too is simple enough, and more consistent. It all works beautifully until the Dalai Lama is brought in as an obvious contrast. I wonder if he survives the transition, transplant of sensibility even, and whether Burn wants him to. It's an odd dislocation, or dislocution, that Burn doesn't refrain from addressing several times throughout the sequence. It's a challenge to attention in what people might feel could be a predictive text. Despite his evident technophilia, there's nothing of that laziness in Burn. But the process, and thus our faith in the logic, is remorseless. Some of the lyric moments in the first extract quoted justify a whole book of more predictable poetry.
Prisons too let in light, very infrequently. One of Burn’s other strengths has been to choreograph incarceration, torture, and false imprisonment with war and the war on survivors (if they do survive) of the mental health system. An exhibited artist, his visualization is predictably strong. He effects this through light, and, improbably, music with its notions of flight, birdsong and piercing boundaries through sound. The whole process recalls Carceri d’Invenzione. Think of the stair-twisted Victorian Gothic piles where people used to be locked up, and what mind-altering drugs they were dosed with, and you’d have a pretty fair notion of such asylums as interiors, even now the great iron-railed institutions are now adorning business weekends.

These are Piranesi’s Imaginary Prisons, drawings and paintings of whole vortices of light from the 1780s, surreally distorting enlightenment, which led to musical answers around the Millennium. Brian Ferneyhough addressed a whole sequence (1983–87) to these astonishing twists of stair, tower and light. Maxwell Davies’s 7th Quartet, meditating on the spiraling architecture of baroque imaginee (and suicide) Borromini readily admitted (to this writer) that his 7th String Quartet (2005) was also inspired by Piranesi. This intensity lends some notion of how Burn traps music in an entrapped place. Maxwell Davies in his 3rd Quartet (2003) reacted violently to the Iraq invasion. This text, located in the early spring of 2003, is ambered in a similar pain.

The organ-like invocation above, its Gothic, is conjured in Burn by the sudden appearance of Dietrich Buxtehude’s (1637–1707) baroque organ music, ‘nectar surging’. Why Buxtehude? Perhaps he’s that bit more mid-baroque, ornamented and beautifully encrusted, and less familiar than Bach. Perhaps he just happened to have a CD of him hidden from the staff. It’s just possibly Buxtehude’s Motet Membra Jesu Nostri (‘who nailed Easter to this pagan ceremony’). Anyway, Christianity is hammered and nailed along the way. It’s a time of Calvary and such radio or CD influences flood-plane in, in an appropriate, penitential underpinning of an obscenely sacred time of war. Mostly Burn is arrested (and arrests us obviously) by the notion of trapping musical divas’ voices and then their distressed Priory-admitted selves into such mis-named places of sanctuary. Not that they’d thank you for Buxtehude. Noel Coward might, on a blue day. He’s there too, as a jibe or jibber. Repeatedly music is bounced off the walls and trapped:

29/3 cheap music hissing on thru / sorry any pop princesses detained in psychiatric institutes but / wanting to hammer hammer the unbroken fist / blinds closed all day / our artillery fired into basra / in the eating of meat - that clotted vast wastage / to wake singing / julian copes motorik: buxtehudes nectar surging / urging armistice in sweet-truth-tooth / who nailed easter to this pagan ceremony? / and unto matana roberts tongue flutter depressions, the metal-stressing / nail garlands to fontanelle / spines abandoned, everywhere their embroidery / like the hail flurrying blossom early, way too / no-fade out but coming to a dead-stop

Evoking Coward, de-toxing divas, and the pounding headache of the head and guns in Basra is a classic Burn move. But the montage of ‘in the eating of meat – that clotted vast wastage’ goes as aleatoric as a 1970s album montage. Paganism and nailing garlands (a subversion of crucifixion) moves the language from religion to less fixed, or fixated failures of faith, as Burn writes it. This is a theme he returns to in the fourth extract, or entry:

31/3 must-of been one their other satanic majesties are and drank her and we are what’s left / bottom falls out the mango chutney / fairy rings bottom the park, no-ones dancing / zimbabwes slo-mo steal much like the americans eight year ago / a week now, i’ve watched this leaf grow stop-mo / top of cistern as i piss / and i piss often (side effects) / first, a tiny scarlet as fairytale trick / then incremental slow swelling / now lung-urge plentiful / cello closest to human voice, how swans talk / the long-spell condemning / and so exiled from what thoughts

Here the demotic curls up with bitter laughter and then turns in on itself. You start with music and end with it (cello register of human voice) but in between the painful effects of medicated pissing means this is no act of purgation, more of purgatory. The detritus of abandoned paganism (‘fairies rings bottom the park’) and Zimbabwe offer a detritus of shattered hopes (paganism and post-colonialism). Burn frantically patterns the day’s events and extend the metaphors he tried in the second entry, two days earlier. This antiphonal patterning works well for the first/third, and second/fourth entries.

The whole process is calendrical – one lunar month. But Burn’s point is timeless, or at least humbly timeless. We move from Iraq almost imperceptibly as the news itself tries, and other obsession fuse and literally burn themselves out. Many elements from the natural world assert themselves as a kind of shorthand for freedom and then bleach themselves. This is striking in 03/4:

03/4 vine edges known world/s / arc roots above heads / spirograph feet in sand / and now from under / bells toll free of the winding-sheet / school was only ever the goalpost / least folks stopped stroking our shaved head / what message did your last kite carry? / ghost markets, our hair whiter, both hands on the eclipse / breathe in silenced theatre / a coda kicking chair away / anyone who dreams is only living / your song rips on thru

The beaches and vegetative life persist, as do shaved heads (here patronized like children from torture camps or those with lice), and morph later into Tibet’s protests (emergent in 2 003) in the light of the imminent Olympic Games. The startling beauty of such phrases as ‘arc roots above heads’ and ‘ghost markets, our hair whiter’ do carry the charge of dispossession Burn feels and articulates so frenetically. N later entries like 4/4 ‘forty year on from mlk, this young blackbird huddled defiant beside red railings’ carries the natural and animal world into a kind of startled empathy. But what is ‘mlk’? Milk? Some treaty he knows. But Burn too is enlarging his own and not merely dragging things in through a narrow keyhole.

Obsessions recur: 05/4 begins: ‘highest number of florists per shaved head’ head / rice price doubling in the switch to biofuels / of risperidone: the mechanism of action is unknown’ which ushers in the green imagery which perhaps comes to pervade the later textures. 6/4 contains the Olympic shaved heads but is mostly private ‘children shrieking like gulls’ and ‘our muscles torn to a differing / shroud of anti-psychotics ever tighter winding in’, which suggests again this ‘feathering’ of physical containment as he expresses it. The sequence adjusts itself; holds still near its centre, ‘all roads lead oil’ a shorthand for keeping the road rolling.

But what are we to make of 10/4’s ‘so loki made a ship from nails of the dead / irises strain / the unwind of light’? So far, so lyrical. But it then spoils off into Burlesque about Moses, the burning bush and the ‘orifice of fair trading’ taking it up the arse from Saudis? ‘We’re back with oil, but where was Loki?’ It recalls Keats’s cancelled opening stanza to his ‘Ode to Melancholy’: ‘Though you should build a bark of dead men’s bones’. Here the ‘nails of the dead’ evoke charred dead soldiers, perhaps, or civilians. This harrowing is undermined by the sudden switch to agitprop. Burn destabilizes not only the text but himself, deliberately. In his concluding lines, the ‘appeal the burning, the burn / and ranged against the word, the world / flechettes ululate in dank coda’ he enacts his own named powerlessness, the absurdity of Burn communicating anything. As Edward Bond has his imagined late Shakespeare despairing ‘Was anything done?’ in his great 1974 play Bingo (which Burn the dramatist will be familiar with, enacting suicide and political disenfranchisement), Burn asks this of himself. The stanza, after giggles, peters out into a ‘dank coda’.

11/4 re-iterates his despair, but notice how he injects political comment like an adrenalin shot: ‘how can you go on strike if you don’t have work?’ mugabe sits it out / the minotaur in each of us / this dreadful itch / no rehearsal room’ Burn gets away with this superbly twisted reflection which also enacts his theatrical take on living without rehearsal space. Which might have become formulaic if he’d persisted in starting each of these paragraphs with political reflections. He doesn’t. He flickers with them in opportune licks of a lizard-tongued politics.

IV

But politics re-surfaces, enacting a restless worry over what her terms ‘suicides never far below’ in 12/4. So 11/4’s ‘icarus rare, air and fleshy / trust to elbow room? / da vinci’s mother was slave’ moves into Italian neo-Fascist poitics and Berlusconi by default. More important though is this lyric impulse which Burn trips up but melting it as it were, as Icarus’ wings were, collapsing him into the sea. The ‘elbow room’ is clearly a restricted mandate, one that Burn mistrusts: not only is it dangerously dispensed, but only so far in Burn’s managed universe. What does fuse in this middle sequence is smoke – Iraq’s, inevitably – and avian imagery, with its obvious corollaries of freedom and bird’s eye perspective: 14/4 ends: ‘smoke bass, drone and overtone on circling down / your light into us, flex spectral / like curlews playing out’.

But with a poet’s edgy prescence, Burn moves to one of those stories breaking not in 2003, but nearly a decade later. Artificial life. It starts in apprehensions and one might say fancy. Again, Burn enacts his Arcadian fractures, damaged pastoral, a bit like Harrison Birtwistle’s mechanical pastoral (which Burn probably knows well). 15/4 opens: 15/4 trees speak the library of hands / elves walk alongside their secret paths never intersecting our / so-called vivid dream - side effects or hyper-brilliant-realities’ That mightn’t move further than the shredded beer can that turns up, literally on the ground. But 19/4 shows that he’s aware of his movement. First, though, 17/4 refuses to give up its music/pastoral inflections, and some thinner, almost diaphanous paragraphs here end: ‘martinu’s madrigals, violiniouls incredible yearning for country we can never again’ and abruptly vanish.

The great Czech composer Bohuslav Martinu (1890-1959) wrote these amazing string trios, ever prolific, calling them Madrigals after the four and five voiced vocal part-songs that flourished from the 1570s to the 1630s. He took the idea from his great teacher Nadia Boulanger, and Burn finds this appropriation quite haunting, instrumenting something that’s originally sung. Martinu wrote them in France from the 1930s, and later – significantly in exile - in America. Music, birdsong and human, fuse into the imaginary prisons alluded to earlier. Burn’s passion for music of course obsesses his poetry because his obsession inform it at every pitch. But he’s been selective, insistent but not repetitive, and clever in his musical examples.

18/4 rope drops in midday espresso / the smell of faint is seashell / goose-grass too wet to stick / first horse chestnut candles emerging / bin handle dead centre opening whose worlds? / a small vinyl dolphin stuck to tarmac ever after / followed twice this same day / the same shellsuit / shout and replicant breaks cover

This lyrically charged episode with its fantastic opening splash – of coffee, then dolphin – but the waste world celebrated suddenly turns on that dolphin image, reminding us of Blade runner and the inner exile of the branded outsider, the not quite human that those suffering mental distress feel more keenly than most. In itself this wouldn’t be significant if Burn didn’t follow it with:
19/4 these synthetic lifeforms manufactured south / and shipped across this sceptic isle, green unpleasant etceteras / lock and bore, usually to walk slow and irregular / stand them out as they follow / their movement, laughter, gaze angular, trying / pavement eats chips, motion detectors, the coming rfid / operations of the echelon and this all-knowledge thermal imaging inside head

A very British replicant, green and unpleasant, then. Not the American life forms recently announced. But it’s a measured life that threatened the organic. Look, literally at the thermal imaging registering, even sucking at, thought. Burn sees synthetic advancers neutrally, not as threats to some sanctity of life but as a scientifically-induced normalization of the living who have kinks. People are here their own dreams. This is his message, if he has a central one. I think his accent is a larger one, but if there is a didactic message beyond the methodology which forms its own polemic, this is close to its heart.

V

After this there’s a release of un-fractured lyric, paragraphs, or stanzas that can be enjoyed without exegesis. They adumbrate themes, introduce even more squalling children, and every second opening startle with for instance in 24/4 ‘night again gouging glacial / striates head to bleed / the slightest squall blossoming down’, enacting global warmings of ice-caps in the mind, a haunting echo of a Russian spring cracking dangerously in your head. 25/4 takes in, like Robert Burton’s Anatomy of Melancholy of 1621 that Keats so ransacked, an itinerary or litany of querulous ghosts and bedfellows: ‘question marks the shape of spreadsheets, flatbreads, chainsaws / between flower and city, horse - sun - servant / scorpions who pray together / sickle, cleaver, rolling pin’.

It’s a bit like the catalogue of that optimist St John Perse in Anabasis that T. S. Eliot translated in 1931. But there’s it’s not the optimistic, pan-Deistic quasi-Catholic traversal of pre-history of that epic little book. Though it does suggest Burn read it – especially the scorpions. There’s an excoriating political commentary embedded in an avalanche of paper that is pure Burn. In his last entry, 26/4. Burn summarizes his experience suddenly, without ceremony, quite happy to depart:

26/4 massaged meat, the degrees of purity (in) blowing yourself up / turnkeys and turkeys savour remnant shops / banks as victim, and whole islands shaped like gun / solder a room why dontcha? / the electric possibilities between words / dionysus bookmarking fingers / in the slow-mo of feedback / people are their own dreams

This reads like a looping back of tape, to the opening, to puns (soldiers and solders) the inversions ‘banks as victim’ and the raveling up of words and gods – Dionysus being the latest avatar from Greek myth. If a whole island is shaped like a gun, its destiny is violence, and dangerously, people are their own dreams, the image of what their image-making leads them to. It hardly exculpates the poet. Or the reader. It does though suggest a process, a recognition of the hallucinatory life – literally the hallucinated automata that Wyndham Lewis dreamed humanity in one of his benign moments. But that there are ‘electric possibilities between words’, is charging up a hope of some kind of linguistic redemption. It’s as faint as a tracer on one of Burns’ dreaded scans.

This, and much else as political commentary from a managed person, is what Burn invokes as well as evokes in this extraordinary sequence. This work really owns a terrible beauty, and its knowingness is also a shock, since its generation seems spontaneous and clearly traces the magic hand of chance across an iron frame, ringing.

People are there own dreams by Sean Burn is available from our online bookshop, cost:£5.00 + P&P http://www.survivorspoetry.org/bookshop/

Poem 30/3 was performed by Simon Jenner, as part of Survivors’ Poetry’s Celebration Videos for National Poetry Day 2011.
BLACK DOGS by Patrick McManus

he was feeling dark down very low depressed and so he decided to take his black dogs out for a long walk in the sunshine

And for his little brother He does all that he can But I can be so hard to reach I hope he understands.

Regardless of my problems We share a special bond And though I love to see him I'm often not that strong

It's hard for me to go outside To see my kith and kin So I stay at home most of the time To reduce sensory din

So to my older brother I love you very much There'll never be another I look up to so damn much.

pmcmanus q917

05/06/2011

SIMON by Tony_Demoncy

Simon

My Brother is so practical But has a heart of gold The Midas touch with motorbikes He's caring and yet bold

He's loving to his children And loyal with his friends He's careful not to spoil them There's not much he can't mend.

He works a lot of hours To provide for those he loves He holds a special power When taking off the gloves!

patrick

Joined: Thu Feb 22, 2007 11:38 am Posts: 437
Location: London

Re: Simon
Tony is this autobiographical ? have you shown it to him? bests P

SPRINGS by Patrick McManus

SPRINGS 2011

Arab spring Arab youth Arab uprisings applauded wonderful!

British spring British youth British uprisings condemned terrible!

pmcmanus q903

Sammy L @ http://soul-snapshot.blogspot.com

Sat Aug 20, 2011 9:17 pm
Dear Dave Russell,
... I downloaded the Summer 2011 issue of Poetry Express and have read it through. I was particularly interested in your article about John Sinclair and I also like the poetry by April (Fynn) Stuart, Angela Morkos and Dave St. Claire's prose-poem, starting 'This is not a world, in which I exist.' Peter Mackie

Thank you Blanche

Speeding

Like a

Steam

gs slow down

David

Put on the breaks

no reason to hurry
it will all work out in the end

Any comments are always appreciated
My thanks for corresponding with me
It makes more sense to communicate than remain silent

A frozen heart melts like butter on toast
A knife and fork cutting thru
The pages of a billion eyes

Dave St. Clair

Competition

Poetry Kit Poetry Competition hold regular monthly competitions and listings of other writing and poetry competitions. Check their website. Do note they have varying fees: http://www.poetrykit.org/comps.htm

John Tripp award for Performance Poetry | Closing Date: 07-Oct-11

Thanks to: http://www.irvingstudios.com/child_abuse_survivor_monument/ GiveUsAHand_StoryProject.htm

“Can’t you see buried within all that wreckage he’s craving for freedom.” Malcom Lowry

Our disability could be a diabetes of the mind, caused by a traumatic disbelieve?

Solidarity very often invalidated and demonised, and often both together. Could become the modern Jews? Over half of, discharged from old asylums, died within a year of dislocation, neglect, cold! The inadequate, friendly simple schizophrenic, the devastated, emotional hebephrenic, the intense, wordy paranoid schizophrenic... We are not told about them! Also probably, 'guinea pigs' for secret state experimentation - psychotropic, mind-policing and short wave radiation etc.

Fellowship - must associate to counter loneliness and stigmatisation

Local Groups - needed for fellowship, mutual therapy, political initiatives

Full-Shilling-Club - hope to have regular Central London meetings.

Tel: 020 77900269 or Joe 020 85750250

“Reaching Out Monument Story Project" @ http://www.irvingstudios.com/child_abuse_survivor_monument/ GiveUsAHand_StoryProject.htm

John Harrison–survivor poet has had: his poem “Our Silence” included in the project “Reaching Out” Child Abuse Monument.

Celebrate World Mental Health Day with CoolTan Arts New Exhibition: Live & Kicking 6th October to 13th January. At The Independent Gallery, CoolTan Arts, Unit B 237 Walworth Road, London SE17 1RL

A exhibition of works for sale by CoolTan participants exploring the power of creativity, in mixed media

Private View 6th October 6-9pm, refreshments available – every one welcome! To RSVP, please contact Suzie Ragab suzie@cooltanarts.org.uk or 0207 701 2696

Celebrate World Mental Health Day by joining CoolTan Arts Largactyl Shuffle, ‘No Health without Mental Health’ Saturday 15th October 2011, 11.30am. Starting at Maudsley Hospital Main Entrance, Denmark Hill, London, SE5 8AZ

Join CoolTan Arts’ BIG Largactyl Shuffle from Maudsley Hospital (mad house)to(power house) Tate Modern, a fun guided cultural walk with poetry readings and other surprises raising much needed money, please donate to http://www.justgiving.com/CoolTan-Arts.

www.cooltanarts.org.uk E: info@cooltanarts.org.uk
Leeds Survivors

Contact Tom Halloran:
Tel: 01924 820 779
Email: tgh52@talktalk.net

Bristol Survivors

Contact Steve Hennessy
email: cd2007g8825_2@blueyonder.co.uk www.steppingouttheatre.co.uk

Manchester Survivors

Every Mon 4-6pm workshop Common Word, 6. Mount St., Manchester M2 5NS
Contact Jackie Hagan
email: jaclynhagan@hotmail.com

GROW-east sussex

Meet every Tuesday except during school holidays at The Children’s Library
Robertson Passage Hastings

Contact: Ashley Jordan
email: jordan72uk@gmail.com

High Peak Writers

Contact: TBC
email:

Stevenage Survivors

Meets up every other Friday at The Friends’ Meeting House, 21 Cutty’s Lane, Stevenage 7.30-9.30pm
Contact: Roy Birch
email: royb@survivorspoetry.org.uk

The Bread is Rising Poetry Collective

http://www.thebreadisrising.org/index.html

For info; contact: thebreadisrising@excite.com or 001-347-534-5715 [USA]

---

The Poetry Cafe

The Poetry Cafe (The Poetry Place)
22 Betterton Street London WC2H 9BX
Tel +44 (0)20 7420 9880
Fax +44 (0)20 7240 4818
http://www.poetrysociety.org.uk

7.30pm Start

13th Oct  Copping & Musgrove (singer-songwriting duo)

10th Nov  Founders’ Night (original music and poetry by the founders of Survivors’ Poetry)

8th Dec  Alain English  (performance poetry)

Dave Russell feature on a regular basis

Open-mic is a wonderful opportunity for new and more experienced poets and musicians to have their work heard in a friendly, and supportive atmosphere. If you want to read or perform your work you need to arrive between 7.00pm-7.30pm in order to book your floorspot. The doors will open to other audience members from 7.00pm and the performance will start at 7.30pm ish. Finish time for the event dependent upon the amount of people who want to do floorspots however, generally around 10.30. There will be a break half way through. These events are organised by Xochitl Tuck, Events Coordinator.

Tottenham Chances

399 High Road
Tottenham London
N17 6QN
Tel: 0208 365 0653
http://www.tchances.co.uk/

Open Mic Dates: 8pm start

The Fourth Thursday of each month: 27th October, 24th November and 22nd December

email: xmtuck@hotmail.com
Tel: 07796 831 935
Survivors’ Poetry has vacancies for new trustees to join our current Board of Trustees.

We are particularly interested to hear from individuals with business and arts project management experience. You may have an interest in poetry or literature, or have worked in a commercial enterprise. Whatever your background we’d be interested in hearing from you.

Please contact; info@survivorspoetry.org.uk, or telephone the office on 020 7281 4654

---

Donations:

Find out why your donations are vital for the future work of Survivors’ Poetry. Please visit our website’s Donation page to find out about our projects. You can make donations online via our Donations page or via the website bookshop. Alternatively you can send a cheque payable to Survivors’ Poetry or if you wish to include Gift Aid, please make your donation via mycharitypage.com. {Please note that a 2.8% fee is added to your donation by mycharitypage.com.}

http://www.survivorspoetry.org/donations/

---

Survivors’ Poetry

promoting poetry by survivors of mental distress

© Charity No. 1940177

---

“Thank you to all our volunteers, supporters and to the organisations that fund our work.”

---

Thank you to all our volunteers, supporters and to the organisations that fund our work.”
Survivors’ Poetry

promoting poetry by survivors of mental distress

SIGN UP FOR RSS FEED   SEE THE LATEST POETRY PERFORMANCES

Performances

To Celebrate National Poetry Day

Simon Jenner performs Survivor Poetry go to:
http://vimeo.com/survivors

A word from Simon Jenner on National Poetry Day Hillside, Llangatock by David Kessel Father’s Song by Venetia Tompkins 30/3 by Sean Burn 19 Keere Street by Simon Jenner Autumnal Garden by Dino Campana Dragonfly by Bruce James